FRIENDS in the world have their hours of conversation together, but they also have hours of separation. Such is not the case, however, with God and you; if you but wish, there will never be any separation from Him: "If thou sleep, thou shalt not fear: thou shalt rest, and thy sleep shall be sweet . . . For the Lord will be at thy side." (Prov. 3:24, 26). God will be beside you when you sleep, always keeping watch over you: "When I go into my house, I shall repose myself with her: for her conversation hath no bitterness, nor her company any tediousness." (Wis. 8:16). He does not go away from your bedside when you rest. Rather, He continues to think of you always, so that if you awake during the night, He may speak to you by His inspirations and receive in return from you an act of love or of oblation or of thanksgiving; and in this way, even during the night, He keeps up His loving conversation with you. Sometimes He even speaks to you in your sleep and makes His voice sound in your ears, that you may put His wishes into execution when you awake. "I will speak to him in a dream" (Num. 12:6).

And again in the morning, He is there waiting to hear some acts of love and confidence from you and to treasure your waking thoughts and the work you promise to do for Him during the day, as well as the sufferings you will patiently bear for His glory and love. Now just as He is sure to be present with you at the very moment you awake, even so, do not fail on your part to cast a loving glance at Him and rejoice at hearing from your God Himself the glad news that He is not far from you as He was in times past because of your sins. He loves you and wishes to be loved by you, and hence when you awake, He lovingly intimates to you His commandment: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart." (Matt. 22:37).

CHAPTER 7

LOVE WILL FIND WORDS

YOU ought therefore never to forget God's presence, as most men do. Speak to Him as often as you can, for it does not tire Him, nor does He hold it in contempt, as do great men of the world. If you love Him, you will always have something to say to Him. Tell Him whatever comes to your mind about yourself and your affairs, as you would tell an intimate friend. Do not look upon Him as a high and mighty lord who desires to speak only to great ones—and then, only of great things. Our God delights in stooping down to converse with us, and He rejoices when we make known to Him our most trivial everyday affairs.

Such is His love and care for you that He seems to have no one else but you of whom to think. He is so concerned with your interests that He seems to have no providence except to preserve you, no almighty power except to help you, no mercy or kindness except to have compassion on you, to do you good and win you to His love and confidence by His kind attention.

Then freely open your heart to Him and ask Him to lead you to do His Divine Will in a perfect manner. Let all your designs and desires be directed only toward knowing His good pleasure and gratifying His Divine Heart. "Bless God at all times, and desire of Him to direct thy ways, and that all thy counsels may abide in Him." (Tob. 4:20).

Do not say: "But why should I make known to God all my needs, since He sees and knows them better than I?" Surely He does, but He acts as if He were not aware of the wants which you neglect to disclose to Him and for which you do not ask His divine help. Our Saviour knew very well that Lazarus was dead; yet He did not reveal the fact that He knew it until Magdalen told Him, and then He consoled her by raising her brother to life.

When, therefore, you are suffering from some sickness, temptation, persecution or other trouble, go to Him at once and ask Him to reach out to you His helping hand. No sooner will you have put before His eyes your affliction by saying: "Behold, O Lord, for I am in distress . . ." (Lam. 1:20), than He will console you, or at least give you strength to suffer patiently the passing trial, and it will have been better for you to have had that trial than to have been delivered from it. Make known to God all feelings of sadness or fear that oppress you, and say to Him: "O my God, all my hopes are in You. I offer You this affliction and conform myself to Your Will. But have pity on me, and either deliver me from it or give me strength t o suffer it." And God will surely fulfill in you the promise He made in the Gospel always to console and comfort the afflicted when they have recourse to Him: "Come to Me, all you that labour, and are burdened, and I will refresh you." (Matt. 11:28).

SOURCE OF ALL CONSOLATION

GOD will not be displeased if you seek consolation from your friends; still, He wishes that principal recourse be had to Him. At least, after you have in vain sought solace from creatures, come to your Creator and say to Him: "Men, O Lord, have nothing but words for me: 'and my familiar friends also are departed from me.' (Job 6:13). They cannot raise my low spirits; I will never again seek consolation from them. You are all my hope and all my love: from You alone do I look for comfort—and my comfort will be to do what pleases You most on this occasion. I am ready to bear this cross during my whole life and for all eternity, if such be Your good pleasure. Only help me."

Do not be afraid that you will displease Him if you at times quietly complain to Him and say: "Why, O Lord, hast Thou retired afar off?" (Ps. 9:1). "You know that I love You and long for nothing else than Your love. Take pity on me and help me, do not forsake me." If your anguish does not diminish but instead continues to bother you, then unite your prayers to those of Jesus Christ dying in utter desolation on the Cross, and cry out to Him for mercy, saying: "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46).

This trial should serve but to increase your humility at the thought that one who has offended God does not deserve consolation; and it should occasion a renewal of your confidence in Him, in knowing that God does or permits everything only for your good: "And we know that to them that love God, all things work together unto good." (Rom. 8:28). The more weary and discouraged you may feel, the more confidently should you cry out: "The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear?" (Ps. 26:1). "You, O Lord, must enlighten me, You must save me. I trust in You." "In Thee, O my God, I put my trust; let me not be ashamed." (Ps. 24:2). Prayers such as these should restore peace to your soul, for no one has ever been lost who has placed his hopes in Him. "For none of them that wait on Thee shall be confounded." (Ps. 24:3).

THE GOD OF SALVATION

CONSIDER that your God loves you more than you can possibly love Him. What do you fear? David found comfort in these words: "The Lord hath been mindful of us . . ." (Ps. 113:12). Then you should say to Him: "Into Your arms I cast myself, O my God. I want to think of nothing but of loving You and giving You pleasure. Behold I am ready to do whatever You shall ask of me. Not only do You desire my welfare; You are solicitous for it. Therefore, I leave to You the care of my salvation. In You is my rest, and it will always be in You, since You will that I place all my hopes in You. ' In peace in the selfsame I will sleep, and I will rest: For Thou, O Lord, singularly hast settled me in hope.' " (Ps. 4:9–10).

"Think of the Lord in goodness." (Wis. 1:1). The wise man exhorts us by these words to have greater confidence in the divine mercy than fear of the divine justice, since God is far more inclined to do good than to chastise. So says St. James: "Mercy exalteth itself above judgment." (Jas. 2:13). Hence the Apostle St. Peter warns us that in the fears we feel for our concerns, be they temporal or eternal, we must abandon ourselves entirely to the good God, who has our salvation so much at heart: "Casting all your care upon Him, for He hath care of you." (1 Ptr. 5:7). In this same regard, how beautiful is the title which David gives the Lord when he says that our God is the God who seeks to save: "For He is my God and my Saviour . . ." (Ps. 61:7). This means, according to [St. Robert] Cardinal Bellarmine, that God's own particular office is, not to condemn, but to save everyone; for even though He threatens with His disfavor those who despise Him, His mercy is assured to those who fear Him, as our Blessed Mother sang in her Magnificat: "And His mercy is from generation unto generations, to them that fear Him." (Luke 1:50).

These texts of Scripture I set before you, O Devout Soul, in order that, when you are troubled by the thought whether you will be saved or lost, whether you are predestined or not, you may relieve your mind by considering the desire God has to save you, as is proved by His promises, if only you stand firm in your resolution to serve and love Him as He demands.

REJOICE IN THE LORD

WHEN you receive some pleasant news, do not act as certain unfaithful and ungrateful persons are wont to do: They pray to God in adversity but forget and abandon Him in prosperity. Be as faithful to Him as you are to a friend who loves you and desires your welfare. Go at once to God and tell Him of your joy; praise and thank Him for it, and thus acknowledge that it is entirely a gift from His bounty. And rejoice in this happiness because it has been bestowed upon you by His good pleasure. In Him alone, therefore, seek joy and consolation: "My soul shall rejoice in the Lord; and shall be delighted in His salvation." (Ps. 34:9). Say to Him: "My Jesus, I bless You and will always bless You for the many graces bestowed on me when I dese rve not graces but chastisements because of my many offenses against You." Say to Him with the Sacred Spouse: " 'In our gates are all fruits: the new and the old, my Beloved, I have kept for Thee.' (Cant. 7:13). I thank You, O Lord; I wish to be mindful of Your benefits, both past and present, in order to render You honor and glory for them forever."

But if you love God, you should rejoice more in His happiness than in your own. One who has a very dear friend sometimes feels happier over his friend's good than over his own personal welfare. Then take comfort in the thought that your God is infinitely blessed. Say to Him often: "My beloved Lord, I rejoice more in Your happiness than in any good thing I have; indeed I do, because I love You more than I love myself."

Another mark of confidence which greatly gratifies your loving God is to cast yourself at once at His feet and ask pardon when you commit some fault. Consider that God is so inclined to forgive sinners that He weeps over their loss when they stray far from Him and live in a state of spiritual death. He lovingly calls them in these words: "Why will you die, O house of Israel? . . . Return ye and live." (Ezech. 18:31–32). He promises to welcome the sinner who has abandoned Him as soon as he returns to His arms: "Return to Me, and I will return to you, saith the Lord of hosts." (Mal. 3:7). Oh, would that sinners knew with what tenderness the Lord is waiting for them to grant them pardon! "Therefore the Lord waiteth that He may have mercy on you . . . He will surely have pity on thee . . ." (Is. 30:18–19). If only they realized the desire He has not to chastise them but to see them converted, to embrace them and press them to His Heart. He makes this solemn declaration: "I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live." (Ezech. 33:11). He goes so far as to say: "If your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made as white as snow." (Is. 1:18). In other words: "Sinners, repent of having offended Me and then come to Me, and if I do not forgive you, accuse Me, blame Me, and treat Me as one who has broken his promise. But I will stand by My promise. If you come to Me, rest assured that, even though your conscience be black, My grace will make it white as snow."

"A CONTRITE AND HUMBLE HEART"

FINALLY, God has declared that when a person repents of having offended Him, He forgets all his sins: "And their sins and iniquities I will remember no more." (Heb. 10:17). So whenever you fall into some sin, raise your eyes at once to God, make an act of love and, while acknowledging your sin, confidently hope for pardon and say to Him: " 'Lord, he whom Thou lovest is sick' (John 11:3); the heart which You love is sick and covered with sores: 'O Lord . . . heal my soul, for I have sinned against Thee.' " (Ps. 40:5). Say: 'You go about seeking repentant sinners: behold one of them at Your feet, seeking You. The evil is done: what am I to do? You will not have me lose heart. Even though I have sinned, You wish me well, and I am sorry for the displeasure I have caused You. I propose not to do it again. You who are that God 'who is gracious and merciful: patient and plenteous in mercy' (Ps. 144:8), forgive me. Let me hear the words You once spoke to Magdalen: 'Thy sins are forgiven thee' (Luke 7:48), and give me strength to be faithful in the future."

But particularly when you have fallen into sin, cast a glance at Jesus on the Cross so that you may not be discouraged; offer His merits to the Eternal Father, and then firmly hope for pardon, since, in order to forgive you, He has "spared not even His own Son . . ." (Rom. 8:32). Say to Him full of confidence: "Look on the face of Thy Christ." (Ps. 83:10). "O my God, look on Your Son who died for me; and through love of Him, forgive me."

Reflect attentively, O Devout Soul, on the teaching commonly given by spiritual masters: namely, that you should at once turn to God after you have been unfaithful to Him, even though it be the hundredth time in the day, and you should be at peace again after your faults and after recommending yourself to God, as has been said. Otherwise, if your soul remains discouraged and troubled by the sin you have committed, you will converse but little with God; your confidence in Him will grow less; your desire to love Him will become cold; and you will make little progress in the way of the Lord. On the other hand, if you turn to God at once to ask His pardon and to promise amendment, your faults will help you to advance further in divine love. It is not a rare occurrence among intimate friends that their friendship is strengthened when one has displeased the other but has afterwards humbled himself and asked pardon. Do likewise: Let your sins serve to bind you more closely in love to your God.

WHAT WILL YOU HAVE ME DO, LORD?

WHEN you are troubled by any sort of doubt, whether it be caused by yourself or by others, act as do faithful friends who take counsel from each other about any matter that presents itself: Never fail to give God a proof of your confidence by asking His advice and praying to Him to enlighten you to resolve on what will be to His good pleasure. "Put Thou words in my mouth, and strengthen the resolution in my heart." (Jdth. 9:18). "Tell me, O Lord, what You wish me to do or to answer, and that will I do. 'Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth.' " (1 Kgs. 3:9).

Again, prove to God your confidence by recommending to Him not only your personal needs, but also those of others. God is greatly pleased when, forgetful occasionally of your own affairs, you speak to Him about what concerns His glory, about your neighbor's difficulties, especially about those who are troubled and afflicted, about the souls in Purgatory who yearn to see Him, and about poor sinners who are deprived of His grace. For these latter in particular, say to God: "O Lord, You are so lovable and worthy of infinite love! How can You bear that so many souls in this world, on whom You lavish such great favors, refuse to know and to love You? Nay, they even offend and despise You. Ah, mo st loving God, make Yourself known, make Yourself loved! 'Hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come!' (Matt. 7:9–10). May Your name be adored and loved by all men! Let Your love rule supreme in all hearts! I beseech You, let me not depart from You without You granting me some grace for those poor souls on whose behalf I am praying to You."

"AFTER THIS OUR EXILE "

IT is said that there is in Purgatory a special suffering, called the pain of languishing, for those souls who, while on earth, had little desire for Heaven. This is as it should be, for one shows small appreciation for the beautiful and eternal kingdom which Our Redeemer purchased for us by His death if he desires it but little. Therefore, Loving Souls, never forget to sigh often for Heaven, while saying to your God that it seems as if a thousand years separate you from the day on which you will see and love Him face to face. Develop a great longing to leave this land of exile, this place full of sin and fraught with danger of losing His divine grace: a great longing to come to that land of love where you will love Him with all your strength.

Often say to Him: "As long, O Lord, as I live on this earth, I always run the risk of wandering away from You and of losing Your love. When will the day come on which I shall depart from this life where I always offend You? When shall I begin to love You w ith all my soul and be united to You without fear of losing You any more?" Such was the continual desire of St. Teresa of Avila, to whom the sound of the clock gave fresh joy at the thought that another hour had been struck off her life and the danger of losing God. So intense was her longing for death, which would enable her to see God, that she died from her desire of dying. Therefore, she composed her hymn of love: "I die, because I do not die."

Finally, if you wish to please the loving Heart of your God, try for as long a space of time as you can to converse with Him, with the greatest possible confidence; He will not fail to answer you and even to speak with you Himself. Not that He will make audible sounds strike your ears, but He will answer in words that you will clearly understand in your heart, insofar as you leave conversation with creatures and try to speak with your God—you alone with Him alone: "I will lead her into the wilderness: and I will speak to her heart." (Osee 2:14). Then will He speak to you with those inspirations, those interior lights, those manifestations of His goodness, those gentle knockings at the door of your heart, those pledges of pardon, those feelings of peace, that hope of Heaven, that interior joy, the delightful sweetness of His grace, the loving union and intimate contact with Him: in a word, He will speak to you with those words of love which are readily understood by the souls whom He loves and who seek nothing but Him.

SANCTIFY EVERY DAY

FINALLY, in order to summarize briefly what is scattered throughout the previous pages, I wish to point out a devotional practice which will render all your daily actions pleasing to God. When you awake in the morning, your first thought should be to raise your mind to God and offer Him all the actions of that day, asking Him to help you by His grace. Then make the other morning Christian acts of thanksgiving, love, petition, and the firm resolve of living during that day as if it were the last day of your life. Father St.-Jure teaches that one should, in the morning, make an agreement with the Divine Saviour: namely, that whenever you make certain signs, such as putting your hand on your heart, lifting your eyes heavenward or to the crucifix, or similar things, it is your intention to make an act of love, an act of desire to see Him loved by all, an act of self-offering, and the like.

After you have made the preceding acts, place your soul in the side of Jesus and under the mantle of Mary, and pray the Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus and Mary, to preserve you during the day. Then, before any other action, make at once at least half an hour of mental prayer or meditation; and the principal topic of your meditation should be the sufferings and contempt that our Blessed Lord endured in His Passion. This is the subject which is most precious to devout souls and which most inflames them with divine love.

There are three devotions which you must treasure above all the others if you want to grow in holiness: devotion to the Passion, to the Most Blessed Sacrament, and to the Blessed Virgin. In your meditations make frequent acts of contrition, love of God and self-oblation. The Venerable Father Charles Caraffa, founder of the Pious Workers, used to say that one fervent act of love in the morning meditation is sufficient to keep the soul fervent throughout the remainder of the day.

EVERY ACTION WITH GOD AND FOR GOD

ESPECIALLY, then, in your other acts of de votion, such as Confession, Communion, the Divine Office, etc., when engaged in external occupations such as study, manual labor, or the duties of your state of life, do not neglect, at the beginning of every action, to offer it to God and to ask for His help to perform it well. Acquire the habit of retiring often into the cell of your heart, there to be united with God, as St. Catherine of Siena was wont to do. In short, whatever you do, do it with God and for God.

When you leave your room or your house and when you return, recommend yourself to the Blessed Mother by saying a Hail Mary. When going to table for your meals, offer to God whatever pleasure or displeasure you may feel in eating or drinking; and after the meal, thank Him by saying: "What benefits, O Lord, You bestow on one who has so greatly offended You!" Sometime during the day, make spiritual reading and a visit to the Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin; and in the evening, recite the Rosary and make an examination of conscience together with the Christian Acts of Faith, Hope, Charity, Contrition and firm purpose of amendment, as well as resolutions to receive the Holy Sacraments during life and at the moment of your death, and to gain all the indulgences attached to these acts. Upon going to bed, reflect that you ought to be in the fire of Hell; and go to sleep with the crucifix in your arms and with these words on your lips: "In peace in the selfsame I will sleep, and I will rest: For Thou, O Lord, singularly hast settled me in hope." (Ps. 4:9–10).

KEEP ETERNITY NEAR AT HAND

IN order always to keep recollected and united with God in this life, insofar as possible, take advantage of all that you hear and see to raise your mind to God and to remind you of eternity. For example, when you look at water trickling from a leaking container, reflect that, in the same way, your life is ebbing away and death is drawing near. A lamp running low for want of oil should remind you that one day your life also will have to come to an end. At the sight of a funeral or of a corpse, remember that you also will have to die. If you see the great ones of this earth rejoicing in their dignity and wealth, have compassion on their folly and say: "God is enough for me." "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will call upon the name of the Lord our God." (Ps. 19:8). "They rejoice in vain things: no other glory do I want but to be in God's grace and to love Him."

When you witness magnificent obsequies or see imposing monuments on the graves of famous men, say to yourself: "What does all this avail them if they are damned?" When you gaze at the sea, noting whether it be tranquil or stormy, behold in this the difference between a soul that is in God's grace and one that is not. A tree that has dried up should put you in mind of a soul deprived of God, good for nothing except to be burned. If you should ever see a culprit tremble with shame and fright before his judge or his father or superior because of some grave offense, imagine how frightened a sinner will be in the presence of Christ the Judge! At the rumbling of thunder and when you are afraid, think of the fear that shakes the damned on hearing constantly in Hell the thunders of the divine justice.

CREATION'S HYMN OF PRAISE

IF you ever happen to hear someone who has been condemned to death remark in his grief: "Is there then no escape from death for me?" consider in what state of despair will be the soul that is condemned to Hell and cries out: "Can nothing then prevent my eternal ruin?"

When you view fields and seashores, flowers and fruits, which gladden you with their appearance or with their fragrance, say: "How many beautiful things God has made for me on this earth in order that I may love Him! What further delights He has in store for me in Heaven!" St. Teresa of Avila, on seeing beautiful hills and landscapes, used to say that they reproached her for her ingratitude toward God. The Abbot de Rance, founder of the Trappist Order, was wont to remark that these wonderful things of created nature reminded him of the obligation to love God. St. Augustine said the same in these words: "Heaven and earth and all things tell me to love You." The story is told of a certain holy man who, while walking through the fields, would gently strike with a stick the flowers and plants he met on his way. "Do not speak any more," he would say; "do not reproach me with my ingratitude to God. I hear you; keep quiet; that is enough." St. Mary Magdalen of Pazzi, when she held in her hand a fruit or flower, felt herself wounded by divine love. "Behold," she would say, "how my God has thought for all eternity of creating this fruit and this flower as a token of His love for me."

CHAPTER I8

GOD YOUR ONLY GOOD

WHEN you look at rivers and brooks, think that just as the waters run to the sea without ever stopping, so you too must always run to God, who is your only good. If you happen to be in a vehicle drawn by beasts of burden, say to yourself: "How these animals toil to be of service to me; and how much trouble do I take to serve and please God?" A little dog is faithful to its master for the bit of bread which it receives from him. How much more are you bound to be faithful to God, who has created you and is ever preserving you, who provides you with all goods and lavishes so many blessings on you! When you hear the singing of birds, say: "O my soul, listen to these little creatures praising their Creator. But what do you do?" And then make acts of love. On the other hand, when you hear the cock crow, remember that, like St. Peter, at one time you too denied your Master; and renew your sorrow and your tears. Again, when you see the house or place where you committed sin, turn to God and say: "The sins of my youth and my ignorance do not remember." (Ps. 24:7–8).

The sight of valleys made fertile by the waters running down from the mountains above should remind you that, in a similar manner, the grace of God is poured out on humble souls, but abandons the proud. When you see a beautiful church all decorated, consider the beauty of a soul in the state of grace —a real temple of God. The sea reminds us of the immensity and greatness of God. When you see a fire, or candles burning on an altar, say: "How many years I should have been burning in Hell! But since, O Lord, You have preserved me from it, grant that my heart may burn with love for You as that fire, or those candles." When you gaze at the starlit skies, say with St. Andrew Avellino: "O my feet, one day you will tread over those stars."

CHAPTER I9

CONFORMITY WITH THE WILL OF GOD

IN order often to call to mind the loving mysteries of our Saviour's life: when you see some hay, or a manger or a cave, think of the Infant Jesus in the stable of Bethlehem. A saw, a hammer, a plane or an axe should remind you of Jesu s working like an ordinary lad in the workshop of Nazareth. Ropes, thorns, nails and wood should recall the sufferings and death of your Redeemer. The mere sight of a lamb made St. Francis of Assisi weep. "My Lord," he would say, "was led to death like a lamb for me." Altars, chalices and patens should make you remember the great love Jesus Christ had for us in giving us the Most Blessed Sacrament.

During the day make frequent offerings of yourself to God, as St. Teresa of Avila was wont to do, by saying: "Here I am, O Lord; do with me what You please. Tell me what You wish me to do for You, and I will do it all." Repeat acts of love for God as often as you can. St. Teresa used to say that acts of love are like wood maintaining the fire of divine love kindled in our hearts.

One day the Venerable Sister Seraphina of Carpi was considering the fact that the mule of the convent was incapable of loving God, and she began to compassionate it by saying: "Poor beast, you do not know God; neither can you love Him"—and the mule acted as though it would give expression to its grief by shedding abundant tears. Thus you who can love God should be incited to make frequent acts of love when you see animals that are unable to know and love Him.

If you fall into some sin, humble yourself at once and rise again with a more fervent act of love. When something you do not want happens to you, offer it to God immediately by an act of conformity with His holy Will, and acquire the habit of always repeating in all adverse situations the words: "Such is God's Will and such also is mine." Acts of resignation are acts of love most dear and pleasing to the Heart of God.

ASK AND YOU SHALL RECEIVE

WHEN you have to make a decision or give some advice on matters of importance, first of all recommend yourself to God, and then set to work or give your answer. Repeat as often as you can during the day the invocation: "O Lord, make haste to help me." (Ps. 69:2). Such was the prayer of St. Rose of Lima: "Help me, O Lord; do not leave me in my own hands." And therefore often look at the crucifix and at the picture of the Blessed Virgin which you have in your room, and often invoke the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, but particularly when you are tempted.

God, because He is infinite goodness, has a great desire to grant His graces to us. The Venerable Alvarez one day saw our Saviour with His hands full of graces, going about seeking to whom He might dispense them. He wishes, however, that we ask Him for them: "Ask and you shall receive." (John 16:24). Otherwise, He withdraws His hand. But He willingly opens it to those who pray to Him. And who has ever called upon God, says Sirach, and gone away unanswered? "Who hath called upon Him, and He despised him?" (Ecclus. 2:12). David has written that the Lord is not only merciful, but exceedingly merciful, to those who pray to Him: "For Thou, O Lord, art sweet and mild: and plenteous in mercy to all that call upon Thee" (Ps. 85:5).

Oh, how good and bountiful is the Lord to those who seek Him with love! "The Lord is good to them that hope in Him, to the soul that seeketh Him." (Lam. 3:25). If He lets even those who do not seek Him find Him—"I was found by them that did not seek Me" (Rom. 10:20)—how much more readily will He be found by one who seeks Him, and who seeks Him just to serve Him and to love Him?

Finally, St. Teresa of Avila says: "Just souls upon earth must unite and conform themselves in love to that which the souls of the Blessed do in Heaven." Just as the Saints in Heaven are concerned with God alone and have no other thought and pleasure than that of His glory and of His love, so must you also. On this earth God should be your only happiness, the only object of your affections, the only purpose of all your actions and desires—so that you may arrive at the eternal kingdom where your love will be entirely perfect and full, and where your desires will be completely fulfilled and satisfied.

Live Jesus our love and Mary our hope!

SHORT PRAYERS AND ASPIRATIONS

TO THE MOST HOLY TRINITY

To the King of ages, immortal and invisible, the only God, be honor and glory forever and ever. Amen.

Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts: the heavens and the earth are full of Thy glory.

With all our heart and voice, we acknowledge, we praise and we bless Thee, God the Father unbegotten; Thou the only-begotten Son; Thou, the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete: O holy and undivided Trinity!

May the most just, the most high and the most lovable Will of God be in all things done, praised, and ever more exalted. Amen.

My God and my All!

My God, grant that I may love Thee, and let the only reward of my love be to love Thee more and more. Amen.

My God, my only Good, Thou art all mine; may I be always Thine.

My God, I give You thanks for what You give, and for what You take away; Your will be done.

My God, make us to be of one mind in the truth, and of one heart in charity.

Teach me, O Lord, to do Thy Will, for Thou art my God.

O Most Holy Trinity, I adore Thee, who art dwelling by Thy grace within my soul.

O Most Holy Trinity, Who art dwelling by Thy grace within my soul, make me love Thee more and more.

O Most Holy Trinity, Who art dwelling by Thy grace within my soul, sanctify me more and more.

Abide with me, O Lord; be my true joy.

Blessed be the Name of the Lord!

My God, pour forth Thy blessings and Thy mercies upon all persons and upon all souls in Purgatory for whom, by reason of charity, gratitude and friendship, I am bound or desire to pray. Amen.

O God, be merciful to me, a sinner.

O God, Thou art all-powerful; make me a saint.

ST. ALPHONSUS M. DE LIGUORI

Holy God, Holy Strong One, Holy Immortal One, have mercy on us.

To Thee be praise, to Thee be glory, to Thee be thanksgiving through endless ages, O Blessed Trinity.

Blessing and glory and wisdom and thanksgiving, honor, might and power be unto our God forever and ever. Amen.

Keep me, O Lord, as the apple of Your eye; beneath the shadow of Your wings protect me.

Into Thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit.

O God, come to my assistance; O Lord, make haste to help me.

Vouchsafe, O Lord, this day (or this night) to keep us free from sin.

Deliver me, O Lord, from my enemies.

O Lord, reward us not according to the sins which we have done, nor requite us according to our iniquities.

O Lord, remember not our former iniquities, and be merciful to our sins for Thy Name's sake.

O praise the Lord, all you nations: praise Him, all you peoples.

For His mercy is confirmed upon us: and the truth of the Lord remains forever.

Holy Trinity, one God, have mercy on us!

From all sin deliver me, O Lord.

O Lord, I fear Thy justice, I implore Thy mercy. Deliver me not to everlasting pains, but grant that I may possess Thee in the midst of everlasting joys. Amen.

All through Thee, with Thee, and in Thee, O my God!

Most Holy Trinity, we adore Thee, and through Mary we implore Thee. Give to all mankind unity in the Catholic Faith and courage faithfully to confess it.

Lord, save us, we perish!

Thy will be done!

O merciful Lord, You are never weary of speaking to my poor heart; grant me the grace that, if today I hear Your voice, my heart may not be hardened.

CARDINAL MERRY DEL VAL

O Lord, I am nothing, but although nothing, I adore Thee.

CARDINAL MERRY DEL VAL

O Lord, I am my own enemy when I seek my peace apart from Thee.

VARIOUS ACTS OF FAITH, HOPE, CHARITY AND CONTRITION

My God, I believe in Thee, I hope in Thee, I love Thee above all things with all my soul, with all my heart, and with all my strength. I love Thee because Thou art infinitely good and worthy of being loved; and because I love Thee, I repent with all my heart of having offended Thee. Have mercy on me, a sinner. Amen.

O Lord, increase our faith!

My God, I love Thee.

I believe in Thee, I hope in Thee, I love Thee, I adore Thee, O Blessed Trinity, one God. Have mercy on me now and at the hour of my death, and save me. Amen.

O my soul, love the Lord that loves you from all eternity!

CARD. MERRY DEL VAL

TO OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST

My Jesus, mercy!

ST. LEONARD OF PORT MAURICE

Sweetest Jesus, be not my Judge but my Saviour.

ST. JEROME EMILIANI

Jesus, my God, I love Thee above all things.

Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me!

O my Jesus, Thou Who art very Love, enkindle in my heart that divine fire which consumes the Saints and transforms them into Thee!

Jesus Christ, Son of the living God, Light of the World, I adore Thee. For Thee I live, for Thee I die. Amen.

Jesus, for Thee I live; Jesus, for Thee I die. I am Thine in life and in death. Amen.

O Jesus, Life Eternal in the bosom of the Father, life of souls made in Thine own likeness: in the name of Thy love, reveal Thy Heart and make It known!

O Jesus, the friend of little children, bless the little children of the whole world.

Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God!

Blessed be Jesus Christ and His most pure Mother!

Jesus, it is for love of Thee, with Thee and for Thee.

O Jesus, Son of the living God, have mercy on us!

O Jesus, Son of the Virgin Mary, have mercy on us!

O Jesus, King and center of all hearts, grant that peace may be in Thy kingdom.

O Jesus, with all my heart I cling to Thee.

O Jesus, be to me Jesus, and save me.

Christ Jesus, my Helper and my Redeemer!

ST. AUGUSTINE

O Lord Jesus Christ, Thou alone art holy, Thou alone art Lord, Thou alone art the Most High, with the Holy Spirit, in the glory of God the Father. Amen.

O Jesus, grant that I may be Thine, wholly Thine, forever Thine. Amen.

All honor, laud and glory be,

O Jesus, Virgin-born, to Thee:

All glory, as is ever meet,

To Father and to Paraclete.

Lamb of God, Who takes away the sins of the world, grant us Thy peace.

Grant to us, Thy servants, O Lord Jesus Christ, to be protected at all times and in all places by the patronage of Blessed Mary, Thy Virgin Mother. Amen.

O sweetest Jesus, hide me in Thy Sacred Heart, permit me not to be separated from Thee, defend me from the evil foe. Amen.

O Lord Jesus,

Through Your infant cries when You were born for me in the manger,

Through Your tears when You died for me on the Cross,

Through Your love as You live for me in the tabernacle,

Have mercy on me and save me!

My dearest Jesus, teach me to be patient when all the day long my heart is troubled by little but vexatious crosses. Amen.

TO THE MOST BLESSED SACRAMENT

O Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, have mercy on us!

May praise and adoration ever more be given to the most holy Sacrament!

O Sacrament most holy, O Sacrament divine,

All praise and all thanksgiving be every moment Thine!

O Great Sacrament!

Blessed is He who comes in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest!

Jesus, my God, I adore Thee here present in the Sacrament of Thy love!

TO THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS

May the Sacred Heart of Jesus be loved in every place!

Sweet Heart of my Jesus, grant that I may ever love Thee more!

Heart of Jesus, burning with love for us, set our hearts on fire with love for Thee.

Jesus, meek and humble of heart, make our hearts like unto Thine.

Sacred Heart of Jesus, Thy kingdom come!

O Divine Heart of Jesus, convert sinners, save the dying, deliver the souls in Purgatory.

Sacred Heart of Jesus, I believe in Your love for me.

Glory, love and thanksgiving be to the Sacred Heart of Jesus!

O Heart of love, I put all my trust in Thee; for I fear all things from my own weakness, but I hope for all things from Thy goodness.

ST. MARGARET MARY ALACOQUE

Sweet Heart of Jesus, have mercy on us and on our erring brethren.

All for Thee, Most Sacred Heart of Jesus!

Sacred Heart of Jesus, may You be known, loved and imitated!

Heart of Jesus, I put my trust in Thee!

WHAT WILL HELL BE LIKE?

WHAT WILL HELL BE LIKE?

THOUGH many of the pagans were true atheists, considering Hell a fable invented to frighten the wicked, the more renowned of the ancient philosophers such as Socrates, Xenophon, Aristotle, Plato and others had no difficulty in admitting the existence of a future life—a Heaven where the good would be rewarded, and a Hell where the evil are to be punished. Only the most perverted of men will deny that there is a God, the Creator and Governor of all things. Such men would prefer to deny the existence of God than to face the just chastisement of their own misdeeds.

WE EXPECT REWARD OR PUNISHMENT

On the one hand, men know perfectly well that God is a just rewarder of good, and at the same time they behold in the world countless wicked men who live in the midst of prosperity, while many of the virtuous live out their lives in the midst of affliction and misfortune. Hence, most people are convinced that after this mortal life, there exists another world in which vice is to be chastised and virtue rewarded as it deserves.

TEACHING OF PAGAN PHILOSOPHERS

The most famous of the pagan philosophers did not hesitate to teach that there exists in the other life a Heaven and a Hell. Xenophon and Socrates, for instance, remarked that, "Rewards are in store for those who please God, and punishments for those who displease Him." The same sentiments are expressed by Plato, Plutarch and others. While I refrain from quoting passages from these philosophers, I cannot pass over in silence two beautiful passages of the great orator, Cicero. In the first, he exclaims: "I wish to have no part with those who have recently begun to teach that souls die along with bodies, and that all is destroyed by death. Of far more weight with me is the authority of the ancient philosophers and of our own ancestors. They paid religious homage to the dead, and considered that their entrance into Heaven should be made easy for every good and just man." The second passage is even more to the point: "Those souls, which have been soiled by the vices of this life, will take the false road which separates them from the company of the gods; on the other hand, those who have preserved themselves pure and chaste, will find easy admittance to the divinity, the source of their existence."

BELIEF OF PAGANS

Among the fables of pagan peoples, there are numerous tales which, though they are fictitious, nevertheless attest to the belief of these people in the existence of a place of punishment in the future life. For us Christians, however, this belief of ancient pagans, and their philosophers, is but a substantiating argument. For we have the word of God Himself, attesting to the existence of Hell in countless passages of Sacred Scripture.

WHERE IS HELL LOCATED?

The question as to the place where Hell is situated has been a matter of conjecture among the Fathers of the Church and theologians. St. John Chrysostom, for instance, was of the opinion that it is situated outside the bounds of this universe. More commonly and with more reason, other theologians think that Hell is situated within the earth itself. Some have even gone so far as to declare that it is near the surface of the globe, basing their opinion, rather quaintly, upon the existence of many volcanic mountains such as Vesuvius, the Volcanic Isles, Mt. Etna and others.

CATHOLIC TEACHING

Aside from these debatable opinions, a group of heretics known as the Ubiquitists maintained that Hell is not restricted to any determined place, but is to be found everywhere, since God has not destined any special place for the damned. This opinion, however, is evidently false, and contrary to the common belief of the Catholic Church which teaches us that God has established a definite place for the demons and the reprobate, as is evident from several texts of Sacred Scripture. St. Jerome deduces this specifically from a passage in the book of Numbers (Num. 16:31–33). Here is described the fate of Dathan and Abiron who were precipitated into Hell, falling into a chasm which opened under their very feet. At the same time a great flame burst from the earth and killed two hundred and fifty men who were accomplices in their sin. Moreover, in many passages of Sacred Scripture, the word "descend" is used in reference to Hell, indicating that Hell is situated in the bowels of the earth.

HELL IS A DEFINITE PLACE

This assertion is confirmed by a passage of St. Luke (16:22): "But the rich man also died and was buried in hell." The sacred text employs the word "buried," because burials are made within the earth. Moreover, the rich man himself describes Hell as a "place of torment" (Lk. 16:28), confirming the opinion that Hell is a determined and definite place. In another place it is called a "lake"; "Thou hast saved me from those descending into the lake" (Ps. 29:3); and elsewhere, a pool: "And the devil who deceived them was cast into the pool of fire and brimstone." (Apoc. 20:9). It is evident, therefore, that Hell is a determined place, and most probably situated within the earth. But as to where, precisely, it is situated, whether at the very center of the earth or nearer to the surface, cannot be determined from any revealed document. St. Thomas also declared that the dimensions of Hell, which will be the dwelling place of the damned after the resurrection, cannot be determined.

PAINS OF HELL

Let us now treat of the pains of Hell, and first of all, of that of sense. St. Thomas proves that the fire of Hell is a corporeal and material fire, though for the most part he does not write of the fire which torments the souls separated from their bodies, but of that which the damned are to endure after their corporeal resurrection. Many heretics have maintained that the fire of Hell is not material, but only metaphorical or imaginary fire. There are numerous texts in Sacred Scripture, however, which demonstrate that the fire of Hell is a true, material and corporeal fire. We read, for instance, in the book of Deuteronomy: "A fire is kindled in my wrath, and shall burn even to the lowest hell." (Deut. 32:22). And in the book of Job: "A fire that is not kindled shall devour him" (Job 20:26), revealing that this fire of Hell needs not to be nourished, but, once enkindled by God, burns eternally. There are a number of passages in the book of Isaias referring to this fire of Hell: "Which of you can dwell with devouring fire? which of you shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" (33:14); "Their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched, and they shall be a loathsome sight to all flesh." (66:24). "He will give fire, and worms into their flesh, that they may burn, and may feel forever." (Judith 16:21).

FIRE OF HELL

In the parable of the Gospel, the rich man buried in Hell cries out to Lazarus, "I am tormented in this flame." (Lk. 16:24). He says, "in this flame," to show that the fire of Hell is a fire of a particular type, a fire prepared expressly to avenge the injuries which sin has done to God by carnal pleasures. For, as the book of Ecclesiasticus remarks, "the vengeance on the flesh of the ungodly is fire and worms." (Eccl. 7:19). Hence, St. Thomas argues that this fire will be the instrument of the avenging justice of Almighty God.

CAN A SPIRITUAL SOUL FEEL FIRE?

But here a difficulty is posed: how is it possible for corporeal fire to torment the spiritual soul? In answer to this question, we can only say that we know that it can be done. Perhaps the answer lies in this explanation of many theologians. The material fire of Hell will be given an extraordinary power by God, whereby it will be able to bind the spiritual soul to its place of torment, thus causing the soul untold humiliation and pain.

PUNISHMENT BY COLD

In this same fire, St. Thomas remarks, the bodies of the damned, in addition to the intense heat, will endure bitter cold, passing from one to the other, without knowing a moment of relief. Thus do Scripture scholars explain the passage of the book of Job: "Let him pass from the snow water to excessive heat, and his sin even to hell." (Job 24:19). Hence, St. Jerome says, the damned in Hell endure all their torments in this one fire.

REMORSE OF CONSCIENCE

In addition to their sufferings from the heat and cold of the fire of Hell, Sacred Scripture enumerates a number of other torments which will afflict the damned. One of these is the "worm," to which the Scriptures refer frequently. Some commentators have explained this "worm" as a material thing, which will feed upon, without consuming, the flesh of the damned. But most theologians explain it metaphorically as the remorse of conscience which will afflict the damned in the fire and darkness of Hell. Forever will they have imprinted on their memories the results of their sins; forever will they repeat the words ascribed to them in the book of Wisdom: "We have erred from the way of truth, we wearied ourselves in the way of iniquity and destruction and have walked through hard ways. What hath pride profited us? or what advantage hath the boasting of riches brought us? . . . Such things as these the sinners said in hell." (Wis. 5:6–14).

SUFFERING FROM DEVILS AND DARKNESS

Added to their own remorse of conscience, the damned will also be tormented by the reproaches of the demons. This will be one of the most cruel punishments of the damned: the devils, who are their enemies, will continually mock them and remind them of their sins. Nor will the sufferings of the bodies of the damned cease here. They will also be afflicted by the terrible darkness of Hell, described by the holy man, Job: "Before I go, and return no more, to a land that is dark and covered with the mist of death: a land of misery and darkness, where the shadow of death, and no order, but everlasting horror dwelleth." (Job 10:22).

PAIN OF LOSS OF GOD

A certain author has written, but with little foundation, that the pain of loss is the same for all the reprobate. But it seems far more probable to me and to the majority of theologians that, though the damned are equally deprived of God, this pain will, nevertheless, afflict each according to the measure of his faults and the knowledge he will have in Hell of the God whom he has lost. For it is difficult to believe that one who has lost God by one mortal sin will be tormented in the same degree as one who has lost Him by a hundred sins. It is equally inconceivable to me, for instance, how one who has been in the state of sin for but one day, can be called upon to bear the same degree of punishment as he who has remained in this state for a whole year. For just as he who has loved God more ardently during his life, will enjoy Him more in Heaven, because of the knowledge of the immense good which he will then possess, so also will the damned, who has deprived himself of his God, be more severely tormented in realizing more deeply the great good which he has lost.

TEACHING OF ST. THOMAS

St. Thomas describes for us perfectly in what will consist the happiness of the elect and the torment of the reprobate. Insofar as his intellect is concerned, the Saint remarks, man will find complete joy in the vision of God; but, insofar as his affections are concerned, he will find complete satisfaction in the permanent union of his will with the infinite goodness of God. On the other hand, the torment of the damned will consist in being deprived of all divine light in his intellect, and in finding his affections obstinately turned away from the Divine Goodness. Elsewhere the saintly Doctor teaches that, though the punishment of the fire will be more terrifying, this separation from God is, however, a greater torment than that of the fire.

GOD MAKES HEAVEN

In short, it is God who will be our paradise, for He embraces all goods in Himself, as He Himself once declared to Moses: "I will show thee all good." (Ex. 33:19). Such was also the promise which He made to Abraham because of his merits: "Fear not, Abram, I am thy protector, and thy reward exceedingly great." (Gen. 15:1). And what greater reward can He promise than Himself, who is the one good embracing all other goods?

GOD MAKES HELL

It is also God who will make Hell, for, as St. Bernard remarks, He Himself will be the chastisement of the damned. For just as the elect will be supremely happy because God is for him, and he is for God, so also will the reprobate be unhappy, because God is no longer for him, and he is no longer for God. Let us listen to the threat which God made against those who refused to belong to Him during this life: "Call his name, Not my people'; for you are not my people, and I will not be yours." (Osee 1:9). It is in this, then, that the torment of the damned will consist; it consists in the first sentence which Jesus Christ will pronounce over His enemies: "Depart from me into everlasting fire." This eternal separation will constitute Hell for the damned.

ETERNAL CHOICE IS MADE DURING LIFE

For the present, sinners, blinded by the apparent goods of this earth, choose to live far from God and to turn their backs upon Him. And should God, who cannot dwell with sin, wish to enter into their hearts by expelling sin from them, they are not ashamed to repel Him, exclaiming: "Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." (Job 21:14). Depart from us, we do not wish to follow Your ways, but our own, our passions, our pleasures. The great multitude of those, says Sacred Scripture, "who sleep in the dust of the earth, shall awake; some unto life everlasting, and others unto reproach, to see it always?' (Dan. 12:2). Yes, these unfortunates now sleep in the dust of their blindness; but, in the other life, unfortunately for them, they will awaken and realize the immense good which they have lost in voluntarily losing God.

GREATEST PAIN OF HELL

The sword which shall pierce them with the greatest sorrow will be the thought of having lost God, and of having lost Him through their own fault. Unfortunates that they are! They now seek to lose sight of God, but once fallen into Hell, they will no longer be able to cease thinking of Him, and in this will their chastisement consist.

St. Augustine says that in Hell, the damned will be forced to think of nothing but God, and that will cause them terrible torment. And St. Bona-venture, expressing the same sentiments, says that no thought will torment the damned more than the thought of God. The Lord will grant to them such a vivid knowledge of their offended God, His goodness so unworthily spurned, and consequently, of the chastisement which their crimes have merited, that this knowledge will cause them a suffering greater than that of all the other punishments of Hell.

We read in the book of Ezechiel: "Over the heads of the living creatures was the likeness of the firmament, as the appearance of crystal terrible to behold, and stretched out over their heads above." (1:22). Explaining these words, one author says that the damned will have continually before their eyes a terrible crystal or mirror: with the assistance of some fatal light, they will behold, on one hand, the immense good which they have lost in voluntarily losing divine grace, and, on the other, they will view the justly wrathful face of God; and this torment will surpass by a million times all the other punishments of Hell.

On this same subject, the author Cajetan makes the following reflection upon the words of David: "The wicked shall be turned into hell, all the nations that forget God." (Ps. 9:18). The Prophet, says this author, does not here speak of a change of heart, or conversion, but of the spirit of sinners. For just as sinners do not wish to think of God during this life, that they might not be forced to renounce their passions, they will be forced—despite themselves and by a just chastisement—to think continuously of God in Hell. They would wish to shut out all remembrance of God from their minds, but they will be forced to think always of Him, thus recalling all the benefits which they have received from Him, as well as the offenses which they have committed against Him and by which they have been separated from Him for all eternity.

THE DAMNED DO NOT FORGET

Let us now consider briefly the condition of the intellect of the damned in Hell. St. Thomas says that the damned will be able to remember all the subjects of natural knowledge which they acquired here on earth, for this acquired knowledge will remain in their souls after death. This is evident from Sacred Scripture as well, from the response of Abraham to the rich man buried in Hell: "Son, remember that thou didst receive good things in thy lifetime." (Lk. 16:25). This, then, is the conclusion of the Angelic Doctor: Just as in the elect there will be nothing that is not a subject of happiness to them, so also in the damned there will be nothing which will not be a subject of torment to them. Hence, the damned will preserve in their memories the things which they knew here on earth, not, it is true, for their consolation, but solely to increase their torment. Moreover, during this life the soul is frequently prevented from considering thoughts which would be disagreeable to it, because of corporeal sufferings and anxieties; but in Hell the soul will no longer be subject to this influence of the body. Hence, in Hell the soul will no longer be prevented from considering those things which can be a cause of torture to it. Likewise, in Hell the soul of a man will have constantly in its memory all the divine appeals made to it during life, as well as the number of sins which he committed, each of which will procure for him a new Hell.

THE DAMNED KNOW NOTHING ABOUT US

Moreover, says Estius, just as God will procure the satisfaction of the blessed by making them know what concerns us, and especially that which concerns them in a special manner, such as our prayers addressed to them, on the other hand the damned will remain ignorant of all that concerns us, because they are complete strangers to the Church.

DO THE DAMNED HAVE FAITH?

It might be asked whether those Christians who possessed faith in this life, and who have not lost it by apostasy or heresy, will preserve it in Hell. St. Thomas responds in the negative, for in order to believe with a supernatural and theological faith, one must hold with a pious affection of the will to God the revealer. This pious affection, however, is a gift of God, of which He deprives them as well as the demons. They do, however, believe by a sort of natural faith, to which they are forced by the evidence of external signs, though this faith in not supernatural. It is in this sense that St. James has written that "The devils also believe and tremble" (James 2:19), signifying that their faith is forced and fearful.

Will the damned ever see or behold the glory of the Blessed? St. Thomas answers that at the Last Judgment the reprobate will see the blessed in their glory, without being able to distinguish in what it consists, solely realizing that they are enjoying an inexplicable glory. This sight will afflict them with great sorrow, either because of a feeling of envy, or because of regret at having lost that which they themselves could have acquired. And for their eternal chastisement, this shadow of the beatific vision which they have beheld will remain imprinted in their memory forever.

THE WILL IS SET ON EVIL

Let us now discuss the condition of the will of the damned. St. Thomas remarks that the will of the damned, insofar as it is a natural faculty, cannot but be good, since it does not proceed from themselves but from God, who is the Author of nature; the damned have, however, vitiated it by their malice. But when we consider the will of the damned in its use, it cannot but be evil, for it is completely opposed to the will of God and obstinate in evil.

But whence does this obstinacy in evil proceed? Sylvius, in a very clear explanation, says that the obstinacy of the damned results from the nature itself of their state. For, since the damned now find themselves at the terminus of their existence and deprived of all divine assistance, God, by a just judgment, abandons them to the evil which they have voluntarily chosen and in which they have wished to end their life. It is natural for everything, once it has reached its terminus, to rest in it, unless it be moved by some external power. Now, the damned have terminated their lives with the depraved will in which they have died, and God has resolved to leave them to the evil which they have chosen. Just as the blessed can never possess an evil will, because they are always united to God, in like manner the damned can never turn their will to good, and consequently will always be unhappy, because they are obstinately and irrevocably opposed to the divine will.

DO THE DAMNED WISH EVIL TO OTHERS?

Because of this evil will of the damned, the question might be asked: 'Do the damned wish that all men be damned?' St. Thomas responds in the affirmative, because of the hatred which the reprobate bear to all men. But here a difficulty presents itself. As the number of the damned increases, the punishment of each individual is aggravated: how, then, can they desire an increase of torment for themselves? St. Thomas says that such is their hatred and envy that they would prefer to suffer more cruelly with many others than to suffer less alone. And it matters little to them that among those whose loss they desire are some whom they loved dearly during life. For the Holy Doctor remarks that all affection which is not based upon love of God vanishes easily; otherwise, the order of justice and right would be reversed in Hell.

CASE OF THE RICH MAN IN HELL

If such be the case, then how can we explain the solicitude of the poor rich man in Hell, who besought Abraham to send Lazarus to his brothers on earth, to warn them to do penance lest they also be buried in Hell? St. Thomas explains that the envy of the damned is such that they would prefer to see all men lost, even their own parents; but since this is impossible, and, rooted as they are in self-love, they would rather see their parents delivered from Hell in preference to strangers, for they would be still more tormented by envy should they behold their own loved ones damned and others saved. This, then, is the reason for the concern of the rich man over the salvation of his brothers. The Angelic Doctor adds that this reprobate desired to see his brothers escape Hell, lest his own punishment be aggravated by their damnation, for by his bad example he had given occasion for their damnation.

DO THE DAMNED REPENT OF SIN?

It might also be asked whether the damned repent of their sins. St. Thomas answers that a man can repent of his faults in two ways: directly or indirectly. He can repent directly insofar as he repents by a sentiment of hatred for the sin committed; in this sense, the damned cannot repent of his sin, for since he finds himself confirmed in his perverse will, he loves the malice of his fault. But he can repent indirectly, insofar as he detests his punishment, of which his sin is the cause. Thus the damned will their sin, insofar as its malice is concerned, but detest its punishment, which, nevertheless, can never cease because their sin endures forever.

HATRED OF GOD

Do the damned hate God? St. Thomas says that God, considered in Himself, is the Supreme Good, and therefore cannot be an object of hatred for any reasonable creature. But He can become such to the damned in two ways: first, as the Author of their punishments, by which He is bound to afflict them; second, because they are obstinate in evil, while He is the infinite Good, they would hate God with their whole heart, even though He punished them but little.

DO THE DAMNED DESIRE TO BE DESTROYED?

We ask, finally, whether the damned would prefer to be annihilated and deprived of existence, than to submit to the punishments which they endure. St. Thomas, considering the question in itself, answers in the negative for, as he says, a state of non-being is never desirable, for it implies a deprivation of all good. But if this annihilation be considered as an end of all punishment, St. Thomas says that, from this point of view, the state of non-existence presents itself as a good. It is in this sense that Jesus Christ spoke this sentence of Judas: "It were better for him, if that man had not been born." (Mt. 26:24). St. John seems to say the same thing when speaking of the damned in the Apocalypse: "In those days men shall seek death and shall not find it: and they shall desire to die, and death shall fly from them." (Rev. 9:6). This will of the damned, however, is uncertain, for they wish to continue to exist, that they might always hate God.

PUNISHMENT OF HELL IS ETERNAL

These punishments of the reprobate, which we have been considering, will endure forever. This doctrine of the eternity of the punishments of Hell was first denied by Origen, and later by the Socinians and a large number of Protestants. Origen, however, was condemned by the Second Ecumenical Council of Constantinople, and in general, by all the Fathers of the Church.

THIS PUNISHMENT IS NOT UNJUST

Nor can the eternity of the punishments of the damned ever be qualified as unjust. For anyone who offends God by a mortal sin merits an infinite punishment for an offense which is infinite. Hence, however severe or long the punishment may be, it can never be proportionate to the offense which has been committed. For the majesty of God is infinite; hence, whoever sins mortally merits an infinite punishment. It therefore appears just that mortal sin be punished by an eternal punishment.

HOW PUNISHMENT IS MEASURED

It is useless to object that it does not seem just to inflict an eternal punishment for a sin which endures but a moment. For St. Augustine remarks that punishment is not measured by the duration of a fault, but by its gravity. Even at the tribunals of justice here on earth, the penalty of death is imposed upon some crimes which are committed in an instant.

The Angelic Doctor adds that it is but just that the punishment should not cease as long as the fault does not cease. Now, a fault which remains eternally can be remitted only by the grace of God, which man cannot acquire after death. As we have seen above, the will of the damned is obstinate in evil. Hence, he continues to love his sin at the same time that he submits to its punishment. How, then, can God deliver him from his chastisement, while he continues to love his fault? How can God pardon his sin, while the damned is hardened in his hatred for God, if at the same time the Lord offered him pardon and friendship, the damned refused both the one and the other?

Nor can it be objected, as some heretics do, that it is contrary to the goodness and mercy of God to behold one of His creatures suffer eternally from such terrible punishments in Hell. For, as St. Thomas remarks, God has given superabundant witness of His goodness and mercy toward men. Beholding all men lost by the sin of Adam and their own sins, what great goodness did He not manifest in descending from Heaven to earth to become man, in the endurance of a poor, humble and afflicted life, in pouring forth the very last drop of His Blood amid such terrible torments upon an infamous gibbet? What greater proof of His goodness could He have given to men than to leave to them His own Body and Blood in the Blessed Sacrament of the Altar, that they might there find nourishment for their souls, and that, through this means, they might preserve and increase their spiritual forces until death, after which, finding themselves more closely united to God, they might enter into Heaven, there to enjoy eternally the life of the blessed?

THE PATIENCE OF GOD

Ah! Most certainly, on the day of judgment, the Lord will make known to the entire world how many mercies, how many lights, how much help He has dispensed to each man during his life! And the numerous ingrates, who, despite such favors, have merited such chastisements, with what patience did He not pursue them, with what love has He not begged them to repent? If, despite such favors, they still would not renounce their passions and earthly pleasures, wished to live and die separated from God, voluntarily abandoning themselves to their eternal ruin, how can it be said that God has not manifested His mercy and goodness towards them?

In lieu of declaring the punishments of Hell not to be eternal, some heretics have invented another opinion, maintaining that the punishments of Hell will be lessened after a time, or momentarily interrupted. But this opinion is expressly contrary to the Sacred Scriptures. Isaias, for instance speaking of the reprobate proclaims: "Their worm will not die, and their fire will not be extinguished." (Is. 66:24). And in the sentence pronounced against them at the Last Judgment, Jesus Christ will say to them: "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire."

JESUS' PARABLE OF DIVES AND LAZARUS

"There was a certain rich man, who was clothed in purple and fine linen; and feasted sumptuously every day. And there was a certain beggar, named Lazarus, who lay at his gate, full of sores, desiring to be filled with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table, and no one did give him; moreover the dogs came, and licked his sores.

"And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom. And the rich man also died: and he was buried in hell. And lifting up his eyes when he was in torments, he saw Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom: And he cried, and said: Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, to cool my tongue: for I am tormented in this flame. And Abraham said to him: Son, remember that thou didst receive good things in thy lifetime, and likewise Lazarus evil things, but now he is comforted; and thou art tormented. And besides all this, between us and you, there is fixed a great chaos: so that they who would pass from hence to you, cannot, nor from thence come hither.

"And he said: Then, father, I beseech thee, that thou wouldst send him to my father's house, for I have five brethren, that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torments. And Abraham said to him: They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. But he said: No, father Abraham: but if one went to them from the dead, they will do penance. And he said to him: If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe, if one rise again from the dead." (Lk. 16:19–31).

FATIMA CHILDREN'S VISION OF HELL

(NOTE: In 1917 Our Blessed Mother appeared six times at Fatima, Portugal to Lucia dos Santos and Jacinta and Francisco Marto, three small children. During the course of these six world-famous apparitions—now approved by the Church as worthy of our devotion and propagation—the Blessed Virgin Mary made several startling statements and predictions, among them the outbreak of World War II if people did not change their lives. During the July 13 apparition, she allowed the children to see a vision of Hell. Following is Lucia's description of what they saw.)

At this point, Lucia was heard to say aloud: "Yes, she wants people to recite the Rosary. People must recite the Rosary." The Lady's face then grew very grave and she said: "Sacrifice yourselves for sinners and say often, especially when you make some sacrifice: '0 my Jesus, this is for love of You, for the conversion of sinners, and in reparation for the offences committed against the Immaculate Heart of Mary.—At these words, she opened her hands on the three children once again and the light streaming from them seemed to penetrate the earth, and the children beheld a vision of Hell. Lucia cried out in terror, calling upon Our Lady. "We could see a vast sea of fire," she revealed many years later. "Plunged in the flames were demons and lost souls, as if they were red-hot coals, transparent and black or bronze-colored, in human form, which floated about in the conflagration, borne by the flames which issued from them, with clouds of smoke, falling on all sides as sparks fall in a great conflagration without weight or equilibrium, amid shrieks and groans of sorrow and despair that horrified us and caused us to tremble with fear. The devils could be distinguished by horrible and loathesome forms of animals, frightful and unknown, but transparent like black coals that have turned red-hot." Full of fear, the children raised their eyes beseechingly to the Lady, who said to them with unspeakable sadness and tenderness: "You have seen Hell w here the souls of poor sinners go. In order to save them, God wishes to establish in the world devotion to my Immaculate Heart. If people do what I ask, many souls will be saved and there will be peace."

Lucia later stated that although the vision lasted "but an instant," she felt they would have died of fear and terror if Our Lady had not already promised to take them to Heaven.

DAILY DEVOTIONS TO SAINT JOSEPH

PRAYER FOR EACH DAY

(Read the reflection proper to the day and then close each day with the follow prayer:)

Most holy patriarch, Saint Joseph, I rejoice at the great dignity to which you have been raised in being made foster father of the Son of God, endowed with authority to command Him Whom heaven and earth obey.

My holy patron, since Jesus Himself respected and served you as His father, I, too, wish to enroll myself in your service. I choose you, after Mary, for my principal advocate and protector. I promise to honor you every day with some special devotion, and each day I will place myself under your protection.

As you did enjoy the sweet company of Jesus and Mary during your life on earth, grant that I may ever live close to them and never be separated from God by losing His grace. And as you were assisted by Jesus and Mary at the hour of your death, so grant me protection at the hour of my death, that, dying in your presence and that of Jesus and Mary, I may one day go to thank you in paradise, and in your company praise and love God for all eternity. Amen.

Saint Joseph, patron of the universal Church, protect us. Protect our Holy Father, the Pope, and our Mother, Holy Church.*

FIRST DAY

God, because of the great love He bears us, and His great desire to see us saved, has given us among other means of salvation the practice of devotion to the saints. It is His will that they, who are His friends, should intercede for us, and by their merits and prayers obtain graces for us which we ourselves do not deserve.

But everyone must know that, after the Mother of God, Saint Joseph is, of all the saints, the one dearest to God. He has, therefore, great power with Him and can obtain graces for His devout clients. Let us then frequently say:

Saint Joseph, give me the greatest confidence in your powerful intercession.*

SECOND DAY

We should, indeed, honor Saint Joseph, since the Son of God Himself was graciously pleased to honor him by calling him father. "Christ," says Origen, "gave to Joseph the honor due to a parent." The Holy Scriptures speak of him as the father of Jesus. "His father and mother were marveling at the things spoken concerning Him" (Luke 2:33). Mary also used this name: "in sorrow your father and I have been seeking you" (Luke 2:48). If, then, the King of Kings was pleased to raise Joseph to so high a dignity, it is right and obligatory on our part to endeavor to honor him as much as we can.

Saint Joseph, I consecrate myself to your service forever. Protect me all the days of my life.*

THIRD DAY

The example of Jesus Christ, Who wished to honor Saint Joseph so much, and to be subject to him on earth, ought to inflame all with a fervent devotion toward this great saint. Since the Eternal Father shared His own authority with Saint Joseph, Jesus always regarded him as a father, and respected and obeyed him for thirty years. Saint Luke says He "was subject to them" (Luke 2:51). These words mean that during all this time the sole occupation of the Redeemer was to obey Mary and Joseph. To Saint Joseph, as head of the little family, belonged the office of commanding, and to Jesus as a subject, the duty of obedience. Hence, a learned author has justly said: "Men should pay great honor to him whom the King of Kings wished to raise to such a height."

Saint Joseph, by the obedience which Jesus rendered to you, make me always obedient to the will of God.*

FOURTH DAY

Saint Bernardine of Siena says that we should be persuaded that Our Lord, Who respected Saint Joseph on earth as His father, will refuse Him nothing in heaven; but on the contrary, will most abundantly grant His petitions. Jesus Himself advised Saint Margaret of Cortona to cherish a special devotion to Saint Joseph, and never to allow a day to pass without rendering some homage to him as His foster father. Let us not, then, fail to recommend ourselves each day to Saint Joseph and to ask him for graces.

Saint Joseph, make me faithful in invoking you daily.*

FIFTH DAY

All the faithful should be devoted to Saint Joseph in order to obtain the grace of a good death, and this for three reasons.

1. Because Jesus Christ loved him not only as a friend, but as a father, and, therefore, his intercession is more powerful than that of the other saints.

2. Because Our Lord, in return for having saved Him from Herod, has given Saint Joseph the special privilege of protecting the dying against the snares of the devil.

3. Because Saint Joseph, who died in the company of Jesus and Mary, is the model of a holy death and can obtain this grace for his clients.

Saint Joseph, obtain for me that, like you, I may die in the arms of Jesus and Mary*

SIXTH DAY

According to Saint John Damascene: "God gave Saint Joseph the love, the care, and the authority of a father over Jesus. He gave him the affection of a father that he might guard Him with great love; the solicitude of a father, that he might watch over Him with care; and the authority of a father that he might feel sure that he would be obeyed in all that he arranged concerning this Son."

Saint Joseph, be always a father to us; and grant that we may be always your faithful children.

SEVENTH DAY

When God, destines anyone for a particular office, He gives him the graces that fit him for it. Therefore, since God chose Saint Joseph to fill the office of father over the person of the Incarnate Word, we must certainly believe that he conferred upon him all the sanctity which belonged to such an office. Gerson says that among other privileges Joseph had three which were special to him.

1. That he was sanctified in his mother's womb, as were Jeremiah and Saint John the Baptist.
2. That he was at the same time confirmed in grace.
3. That he was always exempt from the inclinations of concupiscence—a privilege with which Saint Joseph by the merit of his purity, favors his devout clients by delivering them from carnal appetites.

Saint Joseph, shining light of chastity, preserve the angelic virtue in me.

EIGHTH DAY

In the Gospels Saint Joseph is called "just." What is meant by a just man? Saint Peter Chrysologus says: "It means a perfect man—one who possesses all virtues." Joseph was already holy before his marriage; but how much must his sanctity have increased after his union with the Blessed Virgin? The example of his holy spouse sufficed to sanctify him; and since Mary is the dispenser of all the graces which God grants to men, in what profusion must she not have showered them down upon her spouse, who she loved so much and by whom she was so tenderly loved!

Saint Joseph, increase my devotion to Mary.

NINTH DAY

The two disciples, going to Emmaus were inflamed with divine love by the few moments which they spent in company with our Savior, and by His words. What flames of holy love must not, then, have been enkindled in the heart of Saint Joseph, who for thirty years conversed with Jesus Christ, and listened to His words of eternal life; who observed the perfect example which Jesus gave of humility and patience, and saw the promptness with which He obeyed and helped him in his labors, and all that was needed for the household!

Saint Joseph, inflame us with the love of Jesus.

TENTH DAY

Saint Paul writes that in the next life Jesus Christ "will render to every man according to His works" (Romans 2:6). What great glory must we not suppose that He has bestowed upon Saint Joseph, who served and loved Him so much while He lived on earth! Our Lord has promised a reward to him who gives a cup of cold water to the poor in His name. What, then, must be the reward of Saint Joseph, who can say to Jesus Christ: "I not only provided You with food, with a dwelling, and with clothes, but I saved You from death, delivering You from the hands of Herod."

Saint Joseph, increase our zeal for growing in holiness by the hope of eternal reward.

ELEVENTH DAY

We must believe that the life of Saint Joseph, spent in the presence of Jesus and Mary, was a continual prayer, abounding in acts of faith, confidence, love, resignation, and oblation. Since, then, the reward of the saints corresponds to their merits during life, consider how great must be the glory of Saint Joseph in heaven. Saint Augustine compares the other saints to the stars, but Saint Joseph to the sun.

It is, then, very reasonable to suppose that Saint Joseph, after Mary, surpasses all the other saints in merit and glory. The Venerable Bernardine de Bustis (died around 1515) says that when Saint Joseph asks any grace for those who are devoted to him, his prayers have in a certain manner the force of a command with Jesus and Mary.

Saint Joseph, obtain for us a great spirit of prayer.

TWELFTH DAY

To prove the power which Saint Joseph possesses in paradise, Saint Bernardine of Siena writes thus: "We cannot doubt that Christ accords to Saint Joseph, now that he is in heaven, even more perfectly the respect and reverence which He paid to him on earth. Our Lord, Who on earth revered Saint Joseph as His father, will certainly deny him nothing that he asks in heaven." Let us then say to him with confidence:

Saint Joseph, powerful protector of souls, keep us from all sin.

THIRTEENTH DAY

O great Saint Joseph, since God has served you, I also wish to enroll myself in your service. I wish henceforth to serve you, to honor and love you. Take me under your protection and dispose of me as you please. My holy Saint Joseph, pray to Jesus for me. Having obeyed all your commands on earth, He will certainly never refuse anything you ask of Him. Tell Him to pardon me the offences that I have committed against Him. Tell Him to detach me from creatures and from myself. Ask Him to inflame me with His holy love.

Saint Joseph, watch over us, your children.

FOURTEENTH DAY

Most holy patriarch, now that you are on a lofty throne in heaven near your beloved Jesus, Who was subject to you on earth, have pity on me, who am exposed to the attacks of so many enemies, to the evil spirits, and the passions that continually strive to rob me of the grace of God. Through the grace given to you on earth of enjoying the continual society of Jesus and Mary, obtain for me the grace of living during the remaining days of my life united to God, by resisting the attacks of hell. Grant, too, that I may die with the love of Jesus and Mary in my heart so that I may be able one day to enjoy with you, their company in the kingdom of heaven.

Saint Joseph, grant me a horror of sin and the grace to conquer my passions.

FIFTEENTH DAY

Saint Bernard, speaking of Saint Joseph's power of dispensing graces to his devout servants, makes use of the following remarkable words: "To some of the saints, power is granted to succor us in particular necessities; but to Saint Joseph power is granted to succor in all necessities, and to defend all those who, with devotion, have recourse to him." Let us then often say to him:

Saint Joseph, help us when we are in need.

SIXTEENTH DAY

Saint Teresa says: "I do not remember to have asked any favour from Saint Joseph which he did not grant. An account of the many graces which God has bestowed upon me, and of the dangers, corporal and spiritual, from which He has delivered me through this saint would excite wonder. The Lord appears to have given power to the other saints to assist us in a single necessity; but experience shows that Saint Joseph gives aid in all. The Lord gives us to understand that, as He was to be subject to Saint Joseph on earth, so in heaven He does whatever the saint asks."

Saint Joseph, obtain for me the grace of perseverance in prayer.

SEVENTEENTH DAY

Saint Teresa also writes: "I would wish to persuade all the world to be devoted to Saint Joseph, because I have long experience of the great favors which he obtains from God. I have never known any soul especially devoted to him that did not always advance in virtue. I ask, for God's sake, that they who do not believe me will at least make a trial of this devotion. I cannot believe that favours are not granted to Saint Joseph in return for the help which he gave on earth to Jesus and Mary."

Saint Joseph, patron of the interior life, lead me to that perfection which God requires of me.

EIGHTEENTH DAY

Let us ask Saint Joseph for the grace to love our Lord Jesus Christ. This is the particular grace which Saint Joseph obtains for those who are devout to him—a tender love toward the Incarnate Word. The saint merited the power to bestow this grace upon his servants by the great love which he himself bore toward Jesus while he lived on earth.

Saint Joseph, make me love Jesus with all my heart.

NINETEENTH DAY

When Jesus lived in this world in the house of Saint Joseph, could a sinner who desired to obtain forgiveness from Our Lord have found a more efficacious means of obtaining pardon than through Saint Joseph? If, then, we desire to receive the forgiveness of our sins, let us have recourse to Saint Joseph who, now that he is in heaven, is more loved by Jesus Christ than he was loved by Him on earth.

Saint Joseph, obtain from Jesus the pardon of my sins.

TWENTIETH DAY

"And Joseph also went from Galilee out of the town of Nazareth into Judea to the town of David, which is called Bethlehem" (Luke 2:4). In response to the decree of Caesar Augustus, Saint Joseph made the long journey across the hills from Galilee to Bethlehem with Mary, who bore beneath her heart the Incarnate Son of God. What sweet conversations must Mary and Joseph have held on this journey on the mercy of God in sending His Son into the world to redeem the human race, and on the love of this Son in coming into this valley of tears in order to atone by His suffering and death for the sins of men!

Saint Joseph, I wish to belong entirely to you, so that through you I may belong entirely to Jesus and Mary.

TWENTY-FIRST DAY

"And it came to pass while they were there, that the days for her to be delivered were fulfilled. And she brought forth her firstborn son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn" (Luke 2:6–7). How great must have been the sorrow of Saint Joseph when he could find no shelter for Mary on the night of the birth of the Divine Word, and was obliged to bring her to a stable! How his heart must have been pierced with anguish to see his holy spouse, who was pregnant, and near the time of childbirth, trembling with cold in that damp cave, which was open on every side. Dear Saint Joseph, through the pain which you felt in seeing the Divine Word born in a stable, so poor, without fire, without clothes,, and in hearing the cries caused by the cold which afflicted Him, I pray you to obtain for me a true sorrow for my sins by which I have drawn tears from Jesus.

Saint Joseph, penetrate my heart with contrition and obtain for me the grace never to sin again.

TWENTY-SECOND DAY

"And she brought forth her firstborn son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger" (Luke 2:7). How great must have been the joy of Saint Joseph when he heard Mary calling him and saying "Joseph, come, and adore our infant God, Who is just born in this cave. Behold how beautiful He is. Look at the King of the world in this manger, on this straw. See how He, Who makes the seraphs burn with love, trembles with cold. Behold how He Who is the joy of paradise weeps!" Dear Saint Joseph, through the joy which you received at the first sight of the infant Jesus in the crib, so beautiful and lovely that your heart began from that moment to beat with love for Him alone, obtain for me also the grace to love Jesus with an ardent love on earth so that I may one day go to enjoy Him in heaven.

Saint Joseph, share with me a little of the burning love that you did bear to Jesus.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY

"Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace among men of good will" (Luke 2:14). Consider how great was the love and tenderness of Saint Joseph when he beheld with his own eyes the Son of God become an infant; when he heard the angels singing around their newborn Lord, and saw the stable filled with light. Kneeling down and weeping with love and compassion, Joseph said: "I adore You, yes I adore You, my Lord and my God. How great is my happiness to be the first, after Mary, to see You born, and to know that in this world You wish to be called and reputed my Son! Allow me, then, also to call You my Son, and to say: My God and my Son, to You I consecrate my whole being. My life shall be no longer mine, but shall be Yours without reserve!"

Saint Joseph, grant that I may spend my life, like you, in the service of God.*

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY

"An angel of the Lord appeared in a dream to Joseph, saying, 'Arise, and take the child and His mother and flee into Egypt'" (Matt. 2:13). Consider the ready obedience of Saint Joseph, who raised no doubts about the time of the journey, nor about the manner of travelling, nor about the place in Egypt in which they were to stay, but immediately prepared to set out. He instantly makes known to Mary the command of the angel, and on the same night sets out without guide on a journey of 400 miles through mountains, across rugged roads and deserts.

My holy protector, obtain for me the grace of perfect obedience to the divine will.*

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY

How much Saint Joseph must have suffered on the journey into Egypt in seeing the sufferings of Jesus and Mary! Their food must have been a piece of hard bread. They could have slept only in some poor hut, or in the open air. Joseph was indeed conformed in all things to the will of the Eternal Father, but his tender and loving heart could not but feel pain in seeing the Son of God trembling and weeping from cold and the other hardships which He experienced.

Saint Joseph, obtain for me the grace that in my journey to eternity I may never lose the company of Jesus and Mary.*

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY

"The boy Jesus remained in Jerusalem, and his parents did not know it" (Luke 2:43). How great was the pain of Saint Joseph when Jesus was lost in the temple! Joseph was accustomed to the enjoyment of the sweet presence of his beloved Savior. What, then, must have been his sorrow when he was deprived of it for three days, without knowing whether he should evermore find Jesus, and most painful of all, without knowing why he had lost Him. How great, on the other hand, was Joseph's joy when he found Jesus and realized that the absence of the Child did not arise from any neglect on his part, but from a zeal for the glory of the Father.

Saint Joseph, through the merits of the pains which you did suffer at losing Jesus, obtain for me tears to weep always for my sins.*

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY

"He went down with them and came to Nazareth, and was subject to them" (Luke 2:51). Reflect on the holy life which Joseph led in the company of Jesus and Mary. In that family there was no business except that which tended to the greater glory of God; there were no thoughts or desires except the thought and desire of pleasing God; there were no discourses except on the love which men owe to God, and which God has shown to men, especially in sending His only begotten Son into the world to suffer and to end His life in a sea of sorrows and insults for the salvation of mankind.

Saint Joseph, through the tears which you did shed in contemplating the future passion of Jesus, obtain for me a continual remembrance of the suffering of my Redeemer.*

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY

Consider the love which Saint Joseph bore to Mary, his holy spouse. She was the most beautiful of all women. She was more humble, more meek, more pure, more obedient, more inflamed with the love of God, than all the angels and than all men that have been or shall be created. Hence, she merited all his love. Add to this his realization of the love that she bore for him, and the fact that God had chosen her as His beloved Mother.

Saint Joseph, obtain for me a great love for Mary, your most holy spouse.*

TWENTY-NINTH DAY

Consider the love which Joseph bore to Jesus. This love was not purely human like the love of other fathers, but super-human; for he loved Jesus not only as his son but also as his God. Joseph knew from the angel that his child was the Divine Word Who had become man to save mankind. He realized, too, that he himself had been chosen from among all men to be the protector and guardian of this divine Infant. What a flame of holy love must, then, have been enkindled in the heart of Joseph by reflecting on all these things, and by the sight of his Lord obeying him like a little boy, opening and closing the door, helping him to saw or to plane, gathering fragments of wood, or sweeping the house!

Saint Joseph, remove from my heart all that could be an obstacle to the love of God.*

THIRTIETH DAY

"Precious in the eyes of the Lord is the death of His faithful ones" (Psalm 116:15. It is Psalm 115:6 in the Vulgate.) After having faithfully served Jesus and Mary, Saint Joseph reached the end of his life in the house at Nazareth. There, surrounded by angels, assisted by Jesus Christ the King of angels, and by Mary, his spouse, who placed themselves at each side of his poor bed, filled with the peace of paradise, he departed from this miserable life. Who shall ever be able to understand the sweetness, the consolation, the blessed hope, the acts of resignation, the flames of charity which the words of eternal life coming alternately from the lips of Jesus and Mary, breathed into the soul of Joseph at the end of his life?

Saint Joseph, grant me peace, and resignation to God's will at the hour of my death.*

THIRTY-FIRST DAY

Great, indeed, will be the comfort of those, who, at the hour of death shall be protected by Saint Joseph. For this great saint has received from God power to command the devils and to drive them away, less they tempt his servants in their dying moments. Happy is the soul that shall be assisted by this great advocate, who, on account of having died with the assistance of Jesus and Mary, and because of having preserved the infant Jesus from the danger of death by his flight into Egypt, has received the privilege of being the patron of a good death, and of delivering his clients from the danger of eternal death.

Saint Joseph, defend me from the attacks of the devils at the last moment of my life.*

[Father O'Connell added the following two prayers to Saint Joseph. The first, the Litany, was sanctioned by Pope Saint Pius X.]

LITANY OF SAINT JOSEPH

Lord, have mercy on us.
Christ, have mercy on us.
Lord, have mercy on us.
Christ, hear us.
Christ, graciously hear us.
God the Father of Heaven, Have mercy on us.

Guardian of virgins, Pray for us.
Pillar of families, Pray for us.
Solace of the wretched, Pray for us.
Hope of the sick, Pray for us.
Patron of the dying, Pray for us.
Terror of demons, Pray for us.
Protector of Holy Church, Pray for us.
Lamb of God, Who takes away the sins of the world, Spare us, O Lord!
Lamb of God, Who takes away the sins of the world, Graciously hear us, O Lord!
Lamb of God, Who takes away the sins of the world, have mercy on us.
He made him the lord of His household.
And prince over all His possessions.
Let us pray.
O God, in Your ineffable providence You were pleased to choose Blessed Joseph to be the spouse of Your most holy Mother; grant, we beseech You, that we may be worthy to have him for our intercessor in heaven whom on earth we venerate as our Protector. Who lives and reigns, world without end
Amen.

PRAYER TO SAINT JOSEPH

O Saint Joseph, whose protection is so great, so strong, so prompt before the throne of God, I place in you all my interest and desires. O Saint Joseph, do assist me by your powerful intercession, and obtain for me from your divine Son all spiritual blessings, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. So that, having engaged here below your heavenly power, I may offer my thanksgiving and homage to the most loving of Fathers. O Saint Joseph, I never weary contemplating you, and Jesus asleep in your arms; I dare not approach while He reposes near your heart. Press Him in my name and kiss His fine head for me; and ask Him to return the Kiss when I draw my dying breath. Saint Joseph, Patron of departing souls, Pray for me. Amen.

{This prayer, it is claimed, was found in the fiftieth year of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. This seems most unlikely. Who 'found' it? Who 'lost' it in the first place? Who first wrote it? Where are the copies of it in the writings and archives of the saints and scholars who have lived the Christian faith since that early date? Why was it 'found' and not simply passed on in the living tradition of Holy Church? If the claim were true, it would mean that the prayer pre-dates the majority of the New Testament. The claim, I repeat is most improbable.}

In 1505, it is further claimed that it was sent from the Pope (presumably Julius II) to Emperor Charles when he was going into battle. Now Julius was Pope in that year, but Charles V was not to be Emperor until 1519, and, in 1505, he was only five years old. Maximilian I was the Emperor in 1505. Nothing has been found in the historical record of either monarch, or of the Popes to support the assertion.

The prayer, however, is a great prayer. Regrettably, it is often to be found with exaggerated claims attached to it. These cl aims simply cannot be substantiated but remain pious and devout hopes. We will quote a typical example: 'Whoever shall read this prayer or hear it or keep it about themselves, shall never die a sudden death, or be drowned, or shall poison take effect on them; neither shall they fall into the hands of the enemy, or shall be burned in any fire or shall be overpowered in battle.' May it be so, indeed.

Sometimes it is accompanied by this advice: "Say for nine mornings for anything you may desire." This is good advice, surely. But then it is often ruined by words such as "It has never been known to fail." God answers all prayers but He answers them in accordance with His most Holy Will. Wiser publishers amend this statement, if they bother with it at all, to read: "It has seldom been known to fail." Sometimes the caution is added: "so be sure you really want what you ask." This is prudent advice, but if one were to be so presumptuous as to maintain that one could dictate to God and manipulate Him as if he were the subject of some shaman's ritual, by the mere performance of a (very beautiful) prayer, then one really ought to go back and repeat his Catechism classes of infancy.

Saint Joseph, patron of the universal Church, protect us. Protect our Holy Father, the Pope, and our Mother, Holy Church.

METHOD OF MENTAL PRAYER

PREPARATORY PRAYER

O My God, I firmly believe that I am in Thy presence. How canst Thou suffer in Thy sight one who has so often offended Thee ? But I know that in Thy infinite goodness Thou dost invite and even command me to come to Thee. Behold me then at Thy feet. I will look up with confidence into Thy Divine face and ask Thee, Who art my Master, to teach me to understand the truth I am about to consider and to give me the grace to profit by it. Say a 'Hail Mary,' to Our Blessed Lady, adding St. Joseph O my good Angel Guardian and Holy Patrons pray for me.

MEDITATION

FIRST of all, read for a short time, from a meditation book, some subject which you find helps you to pray. Read just sufficient so as to get a point to think about, such as for instance the striking words of our Lord: "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?"

If you find the points of the public meditation does not help you, then take for your consideration. that subject which as a rule helps your devotion, e.g., the Passion, Blessed Sacrament, Sacred Heart, one of the Eternal Truths, or Perfections of God.

CONSIDERATION

MEDITATE for a while on the thought you will have taken for your consideration; that is, think for a short time what it means, what lessons it teaches you, and see how you stand in regard to this matter. Then, as soon as you feel you can speak to God, pass on to acts, affections, and petitions.

AFFECTIONS

FAITH, HOPE, LOVE, HUMILITY, SORROW, PURPOSE OF AMENDMENT, ADORATION, PRAISE AND THANKSGIVING.

The most important of these acts are those of Love and Sorrow for Sin.

The act of love is the golden chain, which binds the soul to God. You should try to make as many acts of the love of God as you can.

These affections may be made in any order you wish. Begin with those acts which you find flow naturally from your consideration.

PETITIONS

ST. Alphonsus points out that the great fruit of mental prayer is that the soul realises its need of God's help in order to lead a good life. Hence it should ask God for those graces which the subject of meditation suggests.

There should be petitions for the increase of Faith, Hope, Charity, Humility, Sorrow, etc.

Earnestly ask God for Humility, Confidence, the Pardon of your Sins, Perseverance, and a happy Death. These petitions may be made in any order and can be united to the affections, e.g., "My God I love Thee, but increase my love."

RESOLUTIONS

These are of two kinds, GENERAL and PARTICULAR.

The general resolutions always remain the same, but the particular resolution can be changed.

GENERAL RESOLUTION.—To serve God and do all to please Him. Religious should also resolve to imitate Jesus Christ by their Recollection, Regularity and Resignation.

PARTICULAR RESOLUTION.—To avoid some deliberate sin, or to practise some virtue, as charity in word. For tepid souls, the first resolution must be to give up deliberate venial sin.

Religious should make their particular resolution the subject of their Particular Examen. They should also, after making their resolutions, renew their vows; for, adds the Saint, "this renovation is most pleasing to God."

CONCLUSION

THE: affections and petitions should occupy most of the time of mental prayer. In a half-hour's meditation give about three minutes to the Resolutions and Conclusion.

Thank God for the light He has given you.

Renew your purpose to fulfil your resolutions with God's help.

Recommend to God the Holy Souls in Purgatory, all poor sinners, and the Holy Father's Intentions, saying for them the "Our Father" and "Hail Mary."

ADDITIONAL REMARKS

"Before prayer prepare thy soul; and be not as a man that tempteth God." -Eccl. xviii.

1. The remote preparation for meditation is a good life. For success in mental prayer, the soul must have a sincere desire to serve God generously. Any deliberate sin spoils friendship with God. In the proximate preparation, three short acts should be made.

(a.) An act of faith in the presence of God.

An act of humility and sorrow for sin.

Petition for light.

2. Most of the difficulties about meditation arise from a misunderstanding as to what it is. The word "meditation" is misleading. Strictly speaking, it means thinking, reflecting, and reasoning. Hence, many falsely conclude that most of the meditation time must be spent in exercising their imagination. St. Alphonsus therefore, prefers to call it mental prayer, because the best meditation is made when the consideration is short, and the affections and petitions abound.

3. The progress of the soul does not consist in thinking much of God, but in loving Him ardently. Colloquy, that in speaking to God from one's heart, is the essential part of meditation. This spontaneous prayer, which comes after reflection, may be made with or without words.

4. Just as you apply the needle again when the thread is drawn out, so the consideration of another point should be made as often as you feel you have nothing more to say to God.

5. Always use the affections and petitions which you feel animated to make. Do not imagine you must keep a precise order. Constantly ask God's grace, which by the light of the meditation you find you need. "Ask and you shall receive" says Our Divine Lord. Supposing that without much consideration, you feel an affectionate remembrance of God, do not stop this loving contemplation to make other acts. If again, your soul is united to God by supernatural recollection, you should not then labour to perform any other acts than those to which you feel yourself drawn to make to him.

6. If you are unwell and find it is hard to meditate even for a short time, it is sufficient to have the good will and say: "My Jesus, mercy. Lord, have mercy on me." Never give up mental prayer on account of aridity. As a statue gives pleasure to its owner, so the willing presence of a soul before God, gives Him pleasure. It is by aridities and temptations that God proves His lovers.

7. If for half an hour you read a meditation book most of the time, this is spiritual reading. If during this time you think and reason, this is study. But if you think a little and then pray, this is mental prayer.

8. Indulgences—Plenary, once a month on the usual conditions, to the faithful who make mental prayer devoutly for half an hour, or at least a quarter of an hour a day. Seven Years and Seven Quarantines, every time one teaches or learns how to make mental prayer.—Benedict XIV. Dec. 16, 1746.

EXTRACTS FROM ST. ALPHONSUS' BOOK ON MENTAL PRAYER

MORAL NECESSITY OF MENTAL PRAYER FOR SALVATION

THE eternal truths are all spiritual, and cannot be seen by the eyes of the body but only by the eyes of the mind, that is, by thought and consideration. Now he who does not make mental prayer, does not see these truths, and consequently does not see the importance of eternal salvation, nor the means he should use in order to obtain it. This is why so many souls are lost: they neglect to consider the great business of their salvation and what they should do in order to be saved: "With desolation is all the land made desolate; because there is none that considereth in the heart." Jer. XII, 11. On the other hand, Holy Scripture says, that he who keeps before his mind the truths of faith, namely, death, judgment, the happy or unhappy eternity that awaits him, will never fall into sin: "In all thy works remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin." Ecclus VII, 40.

He who makes mental prayer instantly sees his defects and the dangers of perdition to which he is exposed, and seeing them, he will take to heart the remedies to be used. David, by meditating on eternity, was excited to virtue, to sorrow, and to penance for his sins: "I thought upon the days of old: and I had in my mind the eternal years . . . and I was exercised, and I swept my spirit." Ps. LII, G.

Mental prayer acts on the human heart as fire acts on iron. When the iron is cold, it is difficult to work; but placed in a fire it becomes soft, and the smith can, without difficulty, give it any form he chooses. To observe the divine precepts and counsels, it is necessary to have a heart which is docile, ready to receive heavenly inspirations, and prompt to carry them into effect. Now man becomes easily moved and docile under the influence of grace—which he receives in mental prayer: there, by the contemplation of the divine goodness, man finds his heart warmed, softened and ready to obey the divine voice. On the other hand, without mental prayer the soul remains hard, obstinate, disobedient, and thus shall be lost: "A hard heart shall fare evil at the last; and he that loveth danger shall perish in it." Eccl. III, 27.

Without prayer of petition on our part, God does not give us His help, and without divine help we cannot observe the commandments. From this absolute necessity of prayer of petition, arises the moral necessity of mental prayer. For he who neglects mental prayer, and is distracted by the cares of this world, will know but little of his spiritual needs, little of the danger in which he is of losing his soul, little of the means to overcome temptations; he will know but little even of the necessity in which we are all to ask God for His grace; and thus he will give up the practice of prayer, and neglecting prayer he will certainly be lost.

Pray, pray, pray, never cease to pray; If you pray you will certainly be saved: If you do not pray you will certainly be lost.

THE END FOR WHICH WE MAKE MENTAL PRAYER

FIRST of all, we make mental prayer that we may unite ourselves more closely with God. This union is not so much the effect of good thoughts in the mind as of good acts of the will, or holy affections.

Secondly, we make mental prayer to obtain from God the graces we need in advance in the way of salvation, and especially to obtain divine light in order to avoid sin and make use of the means which lead to perfection. The principal fruit of meditation is the exercise of prayer of petition.

Thirdly, we ought to make mental prayer not for the sake of spiritual consolation, but, as a primary end, to learn of God what He wishes us to do. It is true, that God is wont to console souls whom He loves, in the time of meditation; but these delights do not last all through one's life: on the contrary, holy souls for the most part experience much dryness of spirit in mental prayer. Happy is he who does not leave off meditation in the time of desolation.

PRAYER OF ST. ALPHONSUS

MY Jesus, Thou hast loved me in the midst of pain; and in the midst of pain 1 wish to love Thee. Thou hast reserved nothing for Thyself. Thou hast given Thy blood and Thy life to gain my love; and shall I continue as hitherto to love Thee so little? No, my Redeemer, it shall not be so, my ingratitude is already sufficiently great. To Thee I consecrate my whole heart. Thou alone deservest all my love. Thee alone do I wish to love. My God, since Thou wishest that I be entirely Thine, give me strength to serve Thee as Thou deservest during the remainder of my life.

Pardon my tepidity and my infidelity. How often have I omitted mental prayer in order to indulge my caprice! Alas how often, when it was in my power to remain with Thee in order to please Thee, have I not spent my time with creatures offending Thee! Oh, that so many lost years would return! But since this is not possible, O my beloved Lord, I now at least consecrate to Thee all the time that remains to me. I love Thee, O my Jesus! I love Thee, O Sovereign Good! Thou art and ever shall be the only love of my soul.

O Mother of fair love, O Mary, obtain for me the grace to love thy divine Son, and to spend the remainder of my life in His love. Thou obtainest from Jesus all that thou desirest; from thee do I hope to obtain this gift.

ASPIRATIONS OF ST. ALPHONSUS

My Jesus, Thou alone art sufficient for me.

O loving Heart of Jesus, inflame this poor heart of mine.

Before I die, make me all Thine own.

Eternal Father, for the sake of Jesus Christ, have pity on me.

My God, I desire Thee alone.

I desire only Thee, and 1 desire all that Thou desirest.

Grant that when I first behold Thee, my Jesus, I may behold Thee appeased.

Rather let me die, than offend Thee more.

I should be too ungrateful to Thee, my God, if after so many graces I were to love Thee but little.

Grant me to know the immensity of Thy goodness, that I may indeed love Thee.

O eternal God, I hope to love Thee for all eternity.

Oh, That I had always loved Thee ! Oh, that I had died rather than have offended Thee.

I give Thee my will, my liberty, dispose of me as Thou pleasest.

May my only pleasure be to please Thee

Thou art Omnipotent; make me holy.

My Jesus, when shall I begin to love Thee, as Thou hast loved me?

Thou hast loved me without reserve; I wish to love Thee without reserve.

My Jesus, grant that I may die, saying, I love Thee, I love Thee.

SAYINGS OF ST. ALPHONSUS

The first means to love Jesus Christ, is mental prayer.

Mental prayer is a familiar conversation and union with God.

It consists not so much in thinking as in making affections, petitions and resolutions.

If God does not bestow His graces upon us, the fault is ours; it is because we do not ask them of Him. All mental prayer should consist in acts and petitions.

It is impossible for him who perseveres in mental prayer to continue in sin.

Remember that the devil labours hard to disturb us in the time of meditation, in order to make us abandon it. Let him who omits mental prayer on account of distractions be persuaded that he gives delight to the devil.

In going to meditation never propose to yourself your own pleasure and satisfaction, but only to please God, and to learn what He wishes you to do.

Many say the Rosary, the Office, and perform works of devotion; yet still continue in sin. But mental prayer and sin cannot exist together.

It is morally impossible for a religious who is not a lover of mental prayer, to be a good religious. Mental prayer is the blessed furnace in which souls are inflamed with the love of God: All the saints have become saints by mental prayer.

Saint Alphonsus Maria de' Liguori, C.Ss.R. (27 September 1696—1 August 1787), was an Italian Catholic bishop, spiritual writer, composer, musician, artist, poet, lawyer, scholastic philosopher, and theologian.

He founded the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (the Redemptorists). In 1762 he was appointed Bishop of Sant'Agata dei Goti. A prolific writer, he published devotional and ascetic works and letters. Among his best known works are The Glories of Mary and The Way of the Cross, the latter still used in parishes during Lenten devotions.

He was canonized in 1839 by Pope Gregory XVI. Pope Pius IX proclaimed him a Doctor of the Church in 1871. One of the most widely read Catholic authors, Alphonsus Liguori is the patron saint of confessors.

BIOGRAPHY

EARLY YEARS

Alphonsus Maria de' Liguori was born in Marianella, near Naples, then part of the Kingdom of Naples. He was the eldest of eight children of Giuseppe and Anna Cavalieri Liguori. Two days after he was born he was baptized at the Church of Our Lady the Virgin as Alphonsus Mary Anthony John Cosmas Damian Michael Gaspard de' Liguori. The family was an old and noble one, though the branch to which the Saint belonged had become somewhat impoverished. Alphonsus's father, Don Joseph de' Liguori was a naval officer a nd Captain of the Royal Galleys. His mother was of Spanish descent.

EDUCATION

Liguori learned to ride and fence, but was never a good shot due to poor eyesight. Myopia and chronic asthma precluded a military career, so his father had him educated for the legal profession. He was taught by tutors before entering the University of Naples, where he graduated with doctorates in civil and canon law at age sixteen. He remarked later that he was so small at the time as to be almost buried in his doctor's gown and that all the spectators laughed. He became a successful lawyer. He was thinking of leaving the profession, and wrote to someone: "My friend, our profession is too full of difficulties and dangers; we lead an unhappy life and run risk of dying an unhappy death." At the age of twenty-seven, after having lost an important case —the first he had lost in eight years of practicing law—he made a firm resolution to leave the profession of law. Moreover, he heard an interior voice, saying: "Leave the world, and give yourself to me."

CAREER CHANGE

In 1723, he decided to offer himself as a novice to the Oratory of St. Philip Neri with the intention of becoming a priest. His father opposed this plan, but after two months (and with his Oratorian confessor's permission), he and his father compromised: he would study for the priesthood, but not as an Oratorian and while living at home. He was ordained on 21 December 1726, at the age of 30. He lived his first years as a priest with the homeless and marginalized youth of Naples. He became very popular because of his plain and simple preaching. He said: "I have never preached a sermon which the poorest old woman in the congregation could not understand." He founded the Evening Chapels which were managed by the young people themselves. These chapels were centers of prayer and piety, preaching, community, social activities, and education. At the time of his death, there were 72 of these chapels with over 10,000 active participants. His sermons were very effective at converting those who were alienated from their faith.

Liguori suffered from scruples much of his adult life, and felt guilt about the most minor issues relating to sin. Moreover, the saint viewed scruples as a blessing at times, he wrote: "Scruples are useful in the beginning of conversion. . . . they cleanse the soul, and at the same time make it careful."

In 1729, Alphonsus left his family home and took up residence in the Chinese Institute in Naples. It was there that he began his missionary experience in the interior regions of the Kingdom of Naples where he found people who were much poorer and more abandoned than any of the street children in Naples. In 1731, while ministering to earthquake victims in the town of Foggia, Alphonsus claimed to have had a vision of the Virgin Mother in the appearance of a young girl of thirteen or fourteen, wearing a white veil.

CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

On 9 November 1732, Alphonsus founded the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, when Sister Maria Celeste Crostarosa told him that it had been revealed to her that he was the one God had chosen to found the congregation. He founded the congregation with the charism of preaching popular missions in the city and the countryside. Its goal was to teach and preach in the slums of cities and other poor places. They also fought Jansenism–a heresy that supported a very strict morality–declaring that "the penitents should be treated as souls to be saved rather than as criminals to be punished." He is said never to have refused absolution to a penitent.

BISHOP

Alphonsus was consecrated Bishop of Sant'Agata dei Goti in 1762. He tried to refuse the appointment, proposing his age and infirmities as arguments against his consecration. During this time he wrote sermons, books, and articles to encourage devotion to the Blessed Sacrament and the Blessed Virgin Mary. His first order of business was to address ecclesiastical abuses in the diocese, reform the seminary and spiritually rehabilitate the clergy and faithful. He suspended those priests who celebrated Mass in less than 15 minutes, and sold his carriage and episcopal ring in order to give the money to the poor. In the last years of his life, he suffered a painful sickness and a bitter persecution from his fellow priests, who dismissed him from the Congregation he himself had founded.

DEATH

In 1775, he was allowed to retire from his office and went to live in the Redemptorist community in Pagani, Italy, where he died on 1 August 1787.

VENERATION AND LEGACY

Alphonsus Liguori was beatified on 15 September 1816 by Pope Pius VII and canonized on 26 May 1839 by Pope Gregory XVI.

In 1949, the Redemptorists founded the Alphonsian Academy for the advanced study of Catholic moral theology. He was named patron of confessors and moral theologians by Pope Pius XII on 26 April 1950, who subsequently wrote of him in the encyclical Haurietis aquas.

OVERVIEW

Alphonsus was a prolific and popular author. He was proficient in the arts, his parents having had him trained by various masters, and was a musician, painter, poet, and author at the same time. Alphonsus wrote 111 works on spirituality and theology. The 2 1,500 editions and the translations into 72 languages that his works have undergone attest to the fact that he is one of the most widely read Catholic authors.

His best known musical work is his Christmas hymn Quanno Nascetti Ninno, later translated into Italian by Pope Pius IX as Tu scendi dalle stelle ("From Starry Skies Thou Comest").

MORAL THEOLOGY

Alphonsus' greatest contribution to the Church was in the area of moral theology. His masterpiece was The Moral Theology (1748), which was approved by the Pope himself. This was born of Alphonsus' pastoral experience, his ability to respond to the practical questions posed by the faithful and from his contact with their everyday problems. He opposed sterile legalism and strict rigorism. According to Alphonsus, those were paths closed to the Gospel because "such rigor has never been taught nor practiced by the Church." His system of moral theology is noted for its prudence, avoiding both laxism and excessive rigor. He is credited with the position of Aequiprobabilism, which avoided Jansenist rigorism as well as laxism and simple probabilism.

MARIOLOGY

His Mariology, though mainly pastoral in nature, rediscovered, integrated and defended the Mariology of Saint Augustine and Saint Ambrose and other fathers and represented an intellectual defence of Mariology in the 18th century, the Age of Enlightenment, against the rationalism to which his often flaming Marian enthusiasm contrasted.

Born at Marianella, near Naples, 27 September, 1696; died at Nocera de' Pagani, 1 August, 1787. The eighteenth century was not an age remarkable for depth of spiritual life, yet it produced three of the greatest missionaries of the Church, St. Leonard of Port Maurice, St. Paul of the Cross, and St. Alphonsus Liguori. Alphonsus Mary Antony John Cosmas Damian Michael Gaspard de' Liguori was born in his father's country house at Marianella near Naples, on Tuesday, 27 September, 1696. He was baptized two days later in the church of Our Lady of the Virgins, in Naples. The family was an old and noble one, though the branch to which the Saint belonged had become somewhat impoverished. Alphonsus's father, Don Joseph de' Liguori was a naval officer and Captain of the Royal Galleys. The Saint's mother was of Spanish descent, and if, as there can be little doubt, race is an element in individual character, we may see in Alphonsus's Spanish blood some explanation of the enormous tenacity of purpose which distinguished him from his earliest years. "I know his obstinacy," his father said of him as a young man; "when he once makes up his mind he is inflexible." Not many details have come down to us of Alphonsus's childhood. He was the eldest of seven children and the hope of his house. The boy was bright and quick beyond his years, and made great progress in all kinds of learning. In addition his father made him practice the harpsichord for three hours a day, and at the age of thirteen he played with the perfection of a master. Riding and fencing were his recreations, and an evening game of cards; he tells us that he was debarred from being a good shot by his bad sight. In early manhood he became very fond of the opera, but only that he might listen to the music, for when the curtain went up he took his glasses off, so as not to see the players distinctly. The Neapolitan stage at this time was in a good state, but the Saint had from his earliest years an ascetic repugnance to theatres, a repugnance which he never lost. The childish fault for which he most reproached himself in after-life was resisting his father too strongly when he was told to take part in a drawing-room play. Alphonsus was not sent to school but was educated by tutors under his father's eye. At the age of sixteen, on 21 January, 1713, he took his degree as Doctor of Laws, although twenty was the age fixed by the statutes. He said himself that he was so small at the time as to be almost buried in his doctor's gown and that all the spectators laughed. Soon after this the boy began his studies for the Bar, and about the age of nineteen practised his profession in the courts. In the eight years of his career as advocate, years crowded with work, he is said never to have lost a case. Even if there be some exaggeration in this, for it is not in an advocate's power always to be on the winning side, the tradition shows that he was extraordinarily able and successful. In fact, despite his youth, he seems at the age of twenty-seven to have been one of the leaders of the Neapolitan Bar.

Alphonsus, like so many saints, had an excellent father and a saintly mother. Don Joseph de' Liguori had his faults. He was somewhat worldly and ambitious, at any rate for his son, and was rough tempered when opposed. But he was a man of genuine faith and piety and stainless life, and he meant his son to be the same. Even when taking him into society in order to arrange a good marriage for him, he wished Alphonsus to put God first, and every year father and son would make a retreat together in some religious house. Alphonsus, assisted by divine grace, did not disappoint his father's care. A pure and modest boyhood passed into a manhood without reproach. A companion, Balthasar Cito, who afterwards became a distinguished judge, was asked in later years if Alphonsus had ever shown signs of levity in his youth. He answered emphatically: "Never! It would be a sacrilege to say otherwise." The Saint's confessor declared that he preserved his baptismal innocence till death. Still there was a time of danger.

There can be little doubt but that the young Alphonsus with his high spirits and strong character was ardently attached to his profession, and on the way to be spoilt by the success and popularity which it brought. About the year 1722, when he was twenty-six years old, he began to go constantly into society, to neglect prayer and the practices of piety which had been an integral part of his life, and to take pleasure in the attention with which he was everywhere received.

"Banquets, entertainments, theatres," he wrote later on—"these are the pleasures of the world, but pleasures which are filled with the bitterness of gall and sharp thorns. Believe me who have experienced it, and now weep over it." In all this there was no serious sin, but there was no high sanctity either, and God, Who wished His servant to be a saint and a great saint, was now to make him take the road to Damascus. In 1723 there was a lawsuit in the courts between a Neapolitan nobleman, whose name has not come down to us, and the Grand Duke of Tuscany, in which property valued at 500,000 ducats, that to say, $500,000 or 100,000 pounds, was at stake. Alphonsus was one of the leading counsel; we do not know on which side. When the day came the future Saint made a brilliant opening speech and sat down confident of victory. But before he called a witness the opposing counsel said to him in chilling tones: "Your arguments are wasted breath. You have overlooked a document which destroys your whole case." "What document is that?" said Alphonsus somewhat piqued. "Let us have it." A piece of evidence was handed to him which he had read and re-read many times, but always in a sense the exact contrary of that which he now saw it to have. The poor advocate turned pale. He remained thunderstruck for a moment; then said in a broken voice: "You are right. I have been mistaken. This document gives you the case." In vain those around him and even the judge on the bench tried to console him. He was crushed to the earth. He thought his mistake would be ascribed not to oversight but to deliberate deceit. He felt as if his career was ruined, and left the court almost beside himself, saying: "World, I know you now. Courts, you shall never see me more." For three days he refused all food. Then the storm subsided, and he began to see that his humiliation had been sent him by God to break down his pride and wean him from the world. Confident that some special sacrifice was required of him, though he did not yet know what, he did not return to his profession, but spent his days in prayer, seeking to know God's will. After a short interval—we do not know exactly how long—the answer came. On 28 August, 1723, the young advocate had gone to perform a favourite act of charity by visiting the sick in the Hospital for Incurables. Suddenly he found himself surrounded by a mysterious light; the house seemed to rock, and an interior voice said: "Leave the world and give thyself to Me." This occurred twice. Alphonsus left the Hospital and went to the church of the Redemption of Captives. Here he laid his sword before the statue of Our Lady, and made a solemn resolution to enter the ecclesiastical state, and furthermore to offer himself as a novice to the Fathers of the Oratory. He knew that trials were before him. His father, already displeased at the failure of two plans for his son's marriage, and exasperated at Alphonsus's present neglect of his profession, was likely to offer a strenuous opposition to his leaving the world. So indeed it proved. He had to endure a real persecution for two months. In the end a compromise was arrived at. Don Joseph agreed to allow his son to become a priest, provided he would give up his proposal joining the Oratory, and would continue to live at home. To this Alphonsus by the advice of his director, Father Thomas Pagano, himself an Oratorian, agreed. Thus was he left free for his real work, the founding of a new religious congregation. On 23 October of the same year, 1723, the Saint put on the clerical dress. In September of the next year he received the tonsure and soon after joined the association of missionary secular priests called the "Neapolitan Propaganda," membership of which did not entail residence in common. In December, 1724, he received minor orders, and the subdiaconate in September, 1725. On 6 April, 1726, he was ordained deacon, and soon after preached his first sermon. On 21 December of the same year, at the age of thirty, he was ordained priest. For six years he laboured in and around Naples, giving missions for the Propaganda and preaching to the lazzaroni of the capital. With the aid of two laymen, Peter Barbarese, a schoolmaster, and Nardone, an old soldier, both of whom he converted from an evil life, he enrolled thousands of lazzaroni in a sort of confraternity called the "Association of the Chapels," which exists to this day. Then God called him to his life work.

In April 1729, the Apostle of China, Matthew Ripa, founded a missionary college in Naples, which became known colloquially as the "Chinese College." A few months later Alphonsus left his father's house and went to live with Ripa, without, however, becoming a member of his society. In his new abode he met a friend of his host's, Father Thomas Falcoia, of the Congregation of the "Pii Operarii" (Pious Workers), and formed with him the great friendship of his life. There was a considerable difference in age between the two men, for Falcoia, born in 1663, was now sixty-six, and Alphonsus only thirty-three, but the old priest and the young had kindred souls. Many years before, in Rome, Falcoia had been shown a vision of a new religious family of men and women whose particular aim should be the perfect imitation of the virtues of Our Lord. He had even tried to form a branch of the Institute by uniting twelve priests in a common life at Tarentum, but the community soon broke up. In 1719, together with a Father Filangieri, also one of the "Pii Operarii," he had refounded a Conservatorium of religious women at Scala on the mountains behind Amalfi. But as he drew up a rule for them, formed from that of the Visitation nuns, he does not seem to have had any clear idea of establishing the new institute of his vision. God, however, intended the new institute to begin with these nuns of Scala. In 1724, soon after Alphonsus left the world, a postulant, Julia Crostarosa, born in Naples on 31 October, 1696, and hence almost the same age as the Saint, entered the convent of Scala. She became known in religion as Sister Maria Celeste. In 1725, while still a novice, she had a series of visions in which she saw a new order (apparently of nuns only) similar to that revealed to Falcoia many years before. Even its Rule was made known to her. She was told to write it down and show it to the director of the convent, that is to Falcoia himself. While affecting to treat the novice with severity and to take no notice of her visions, the director was surprised to find that the Rule which she had written down was a realization of what had been so long in his mind. He submitted the new Rule to a number of theologians, who approved of it, and said it might be adopted in the convent of Scala, provided the community would accept it. But when the question was put to the community, opposition began. Most were in favour of accepting, but the superior objected and appealed to Filangieri, Falcoia's colleague in establishing the convent, and now, as General of the "Pii Operarii," his superior. Filangieri forbade any change of rule and removed Falcoia from all communication with the convent. Matters remained thus for some years. About 1729, however, Filangieri died, and on 8 October, 1730, Falcoia was consecrated Bishop of Castellamare. He was now free, subject to the approval of the Bishop of Scala, to act with regard to the convent as he thought best. It happened that Alphonsus, ill and overworked, had gone with some companions to Scala in the early summer of 1730. Unable to be idle, he had preached to the goatherds of the mountains with such success that Nicolas Guerriero, Bishop of Scala, begged him to return and give a retreat in his cathedral.

Falcoia, hearing of this, begged his friend to give a retreat to the nuns of his Conservatorium at the same time. Alphonsus agreed to both requests and set out with his two friends, John Mazzini and Vincent Mannarini, in September, 1730. The result of the retreat to the nuns was that the young priest, who before had been prejudiced by reports in Naples against the proposed new Rule, became its firm supporter, and even obtained permission from the Bishop of Scala for the change. In 1731, the convent unanimously adopted the new Rule, together with a habit of red and blue, the traditional colours of Our Lord's own dress. One branch of the new Institute seen by Falcoia in vision was thus established. The other was not to be long delayed. No doubt Thomas Falcoia had for some time hoped that the ardent young priest, who was so devoted to him, might, under his direction, be the founder of the new Order he had at heart. a fresh vision of Sister Maria Celeste seemed to show that such was the will of God. On 3 October, 1731, the eve of the feast of St. Francis, she saw Our Lord with St. Francis on His right hand and a priest on His left. A voice said "This is he whom I have chosen to be head of My Institute, the Prefect General of a new Congregation of men who shall work for My glory." The priest was Alphonsus. Soon after, Falcoia made known to the latter his vocation to leave Naples and establish an order of missionaries at Scala, who should work above all for the neglected goatherds of the mountains. A year of trouble and anxiety followed.

The Superior of the Propaganda and even Falcoia's friend, Matthew Ripa, opposed the project with all their might. But Alphonsus's director, Father Pagano; Father Fiorillo, a great Dominican preacher; Father Manulio, Provincial of the Jesuits; and Vincent Cutica, Superior of the Vincentians, supported the young priest, and, 9 November, 1732, the "Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer," or as it was called for seventeen years, "of the Most Holy Saviour," was begun in a little hospice belonging to the nuns of Scala. Though St. Alphonsus was founder and de facto head of the Institute, its general direction in the beginning, as well as the direction of Alphonsus's conscience, was undertaken by the Bishop of Castellamare and it was not till the latter's death, 20 April, 1743, that a general chapter was held and the Saint was formally elected Superior-General. In fact, in the beginning, the young priest in his humility would not be Superior even of the house, judging one of his companions, John Baptist Donato, better fitted for the post because he had already had some experience of community life in another institute.

The early years, following the founding of the new order, were not promising. Dissensions arose, the Saint's former friend and chief companion, Vincent Mannarini, opposing him and Falcoia in everything. On 1 April, 1733, all the companions of Alphonsus exc ept one lay brother, Vitus Curtius, abandoned him, and founded the Congregation of the Blessed Sacrament, which, confined to the Kingdom of Naples, was extinguished in 1860 by the Italian Revolution. The dissensions even spread to the nuns, and Sister Maria Celeste herself left Scala and founded a convent at Foggia, where she died in the odour of sanctity, 14 September, 1755. She was declared Venerable 11 August, 1901. Alphonsus, however, stood firm; soon other companions arrived, and though Scala itself was given up by the Fathers in 1738, by 1746 the new Congregation had four houses at Nocera de' Pagani, Ciorani, Iliceto (now Deliceto), and Caposele, all in the Kingdom of Naples. In 1749, the Rule and Institute of men were approved by Pope Benedict XIV, and in 1750, the Rule and Institute of the nuns. Alphonsus was lawyer, founder, religious superior, bishop, theologian, and mystic, but he was above all a missionary, and no true biography of the Saint will neglect to give this due prominence. From 1726 to 1752, first as a member of the Neapolitan "Propaganda," and then as a leader of his own Fathers, he traversed the provinces of Naples for the greater part of each year giving missions even in the smallest villages and saving many souls. a special feature of his method was the return of the missionaries, after an interval of some months, to the scene of their labours to consolidate their work by what was called the "renewal of a mission."

After 1752 Alphonsus gave fewer missions. His infirmities were increasing, and he was occupied a good deal with his writings. His promotion to the episcopate in 1762 led to a renewal of his missionary activity, but in a slightly different form. The Saint had four houses, but during his lifetime it not only became impossible in the Kingdom of Naples to get any more, but even the barest toleration for those he had could scarcely be obtained. The cause of this was "regalism," the omnipotence of kings even in matters spiritual, which was the system of government in Naples as in all the Bourbon States. The immediate author of what was practically a lifelong persecution of the Saint was the Marquis Tanucci, who entered Naples in 1734. Naples had been part of the dominions of Spain since 1503, but in 1708 when Alphonsus was twelve years old, it was conquered by Austria during the war of the Spanish Succession. In 1734, however, it was reconquered by Don Carlos, the young Duke of Parma, great-grandson of Louis XIV, and the independent Bourbon Kingdom of the Two Sicilies was established. With Don Carlos, or as he is generally called, Charles III, from his later title as King of Spain, came the lawyer, Bernard Tanucci, who governed Naples as Prime Minister and regent for the next forty-two years. This was to be a momentous revolution for Alphonsus. Had it happened a few years later, the new Government might have found the Redemptorist Congregation already authorized, and as Tanucci's anti-clerical policy rather showed itself in forbidding new Orders than, with the exception of the Society of Jesus, in suppressing old ones, the Saint might have been free to develop his work in comparative peace. As it was, he was refused the royal exequatur to the Brief of Benedict XIV, and State recognition of his Institute as a religious congregation till the day of his death. There were whole years, indeed, in which the Institute seemed on the verge of summary suppression. The suffering which this brought on Alphonsus, with his sensitive and high-strung disposition, was very great, besides what was worse, the relaxation of discipline and loss of vocations which it caused in the Order itself. Alphonsus, however, was unflagging in his efforts with the Court. It may be he was even too anxious, and on one occasion when he was over-whelmed by a fresh refusal, his friend the Marquis Brancone, Minister for Ecclesiastical Affairs and a man of deep piety, said to him gently: "It would seem as if you placed all your trust here below"; on which the Saint recovered his peace of mind. A final attempt to gain the royal approval, which seemed as if at last it had been successful, led to the crowning sorrow of Alphonsus's life: the division and apparent ruin of his Congregation and the displeasure of the Holy See. This was in 1780, when Alphonsus was eighty-three years old. But, before relating the episode of the "Regolamento," as it is called, we must speak of the period of the Saint's episcopate which intervened.

In the year 1747, King Charles of Naples wished to make Alphonsus Archbishop of Palermo, and it was only by the most earnest entreaties that he was able to escape. In 1762, there was no escape and he was constrained by formal obedience to the Pope to accept the Bishopric of St. Agatha of the Goths, a very small Neapolitan diocese lying a few miles off the road from Naples to Capua. Here with 30,000 uninstructed people, 400 mostly indifferent and sometimes scandalous secular clergy, and seventeen more or less relaxed religious houses to look after, in a field so overgrown with weeds that they seemed the only crop, he wept and prayed and spent days and nights in unremitting labour for thirteen years. More than once he faced assassination unmoved. In a riot which took place during the terrible famine that fell upon Southern Italy in 1764, he saved the life of the syndic of St. Agatha by offering his own to the mob. He fed the poor, instructed the ignorant, reorganized his seminary, reformed his convents, created a new spirit in his clergy, banished scandalous noblemen and women of evil life with equal impartiality, brought the study of theology and especially of moral theology into honour, and all the time was begging pope after pope to let him resign his office because he was doing nothing for his diocese. To all his administrative work we must add his continual literary labours, his many hours of daily prayer, his terrible austerities, and a stress of illness which made his life a martyrdom.

Eight times during his long life, without counting his last sickness, the Saint received the sacraments of the dying, but the worst of all his illnesses was a terrible attack of rheumatic fever during his episcopate, an attack which lasted from May, 1768, to June, 1769, and left him paralyzed to the end of his days. It was this which gave St. Alphonsus the bent head which we notice in the portraits of him. So bent was it in the beginning, that the pressure of his chin produced a dangerous wound in the chest. Although the doctors succeeded in straightening the neck a little, the Saint for the rest of his life had to drink at meals through a tube. He could never have said Mass again had not an Augustinian prior shown him how to support himself on a chair so that with the assistance of an acolyte he could raise the chalice to his lips. But in spite of his infirmities both Clement XIII (1758–69) and Clement XIV (1769–74) obliged Alphonsus to remain at his post. In February, 1775, however, Pius VI was elected Pope, and the following May he permitted the Saint to resign his see.

Alphonsus returned to his little cell at Nocera in July, 1775, to prepare, as he thought, for a speedy and happy death. Twelve years, however, still separated him from his reward, years for the most part not of peace but of greater afflictions than any which had yet befallen him. By 1777, the Saint, in addition to four houses in Naples and one in Sicily, had four others at Scifelli, Frosinone, St. Angelo a Cupolo, and Beneventum, in the States of the Church. In case things became hopeless in Naples, he looked to these houses to maintain the Rule and Institute. In 1780, a crisis arose in which they did this, yet in such a way as to bring division in the Congregation and extreme suffering and disgrace upon its founder. The crisis arose in this way. From the year 1759 two former benefactors of the Congregation, Baron Sarnelli and Francis Maffei, by one of those changes not uncommon in Naples, had become its bitter enemies, and waged a vendetta against it in the law courts which lasted for twenty-four years. Sarnelli was almost openly supported by the all-powerful Tanucci, and the suppression of the Congregation at last seemed a matter of days, when on 26 October, 1776, Tanucci, who had offended Queen Maria Carolina, suddenly fell from power. Under the government of the Marquis della Sambuca, who, though a great regalist, was a personal friend of the Saint's, there was promise of better times, and in August, 1779, Alphonsus's hopes were raised by the publication of a royal decree allowing him to appoint superiors in his Congregation and to have a novitiate and house of studies. The Government throughout had recognized the good effect of his missions, but it wished the missionaries to be secular priests and not a religious order. The Decree of 1779, however, seemed a great step in advance. Alphonsus, having got so much, hoped to get a little more, and through his friend, Mgr. Testa, the Grand Almoner, even to have his Rule approved. He did not, as in the past, ask for an exequatur to the Brief of Benedict XIV, for relations at the time were more strained than ever between the Courts of Rome and Naples; but he hoped the king might give an independent sanction to his Rule, provided he waived all legal right to hold property in common, which he was quite prepared to do. It was all-important to the Fathers to be able to rebut the charge of being an illegal religious congregation, which was one of the chief allegations in the ever-adjourned and ever-impending action by Baron Sarnelli. Perhaps in any case the submission of their Rule to a suspicious and even hostile civil power was a mistake. At all events, it proved disastrous in the result. Alphonsus being so old and so inform—he was eighty-five, crippled, deaf, and nearly blind—his one chance of success was to be faithfully served by friends and subordinates, and he was betrayed at every turn. His friend the Grand Almoner betrayed him; his two envoys for negotiating with the Grand Almoner, Fathers Majone and Cimino, betrayed him, consultors general though they were. His very confessor and vicar general in the government of his Order, Father Andrew Villani, joined in the conspiracy. In the end the Rule was so altered as to be hardly recognizable, the very vows of religion being abolished. To this altered Rule or "Regolamento," as it came to be called, the unsuspecting Saint was induced to put his signature. It was approved by the king and forced upon the stupefied Congregation by the whole power of the State. a fearful commotion arose. Alphonsus himself was not spared. Vague rumours of impending treachery had got about and had been made known to him, but he had refused to believe them. "You have founded the Congregation and you have destroyed it," said one Father to him. The Saint only wept in silence and tried in vain to devise some means by which his Order might be saved. His best plan would have been to consult the Holy See, but in this he had been forestalled. The Fathers in the Papal States, with too precipitate zeal, in the very beginning denounced the change of Rule to Rome. Pius VI, already deeply displeased with the Neapolitan Government, took the fathers in his own dominions under his special protection, forbade all change of rule in their houses, and even withdrew them from obedience to the Neapolitan superiors, that is to St. Alphonsus, till an inquiry could be held. A long process followed in the Court of Rome, and on 22 September, 1780, a provisional Decree, which on 24 August, 1781, was made absolute, recognized the houses in the Papal States as alone constituting the Redemptorist Congregation. Father Francis de Paula, one of the chief appellants, was appointed their Superior General, "in place of those," so the brief ran, "who being higher superiors of the said Congregation have with their followers adopted a new system essentially different from the old, and have deserted the Institute in which they were professed, and have thereby ceased to be members of the Congregation." So the Saint was cut off from his own Order by the Pope who was to declare him "Venerable." In this state of exclusion he lived for seven years more and in it he died. It was only after his death, as he had prophesied, that the Neapolitan Government at last recognized the original Rule, and that the Redemptorist Congregation was reunited under one head (1793).

Alphonsus had still one final storm to meet, and then the end. About three years before his death he went through a veritable "Night of the Soul." Fearful temptations against every virtue crowded upon him, together with diabolical apparitions and illusions, and terrible scruples and impulses to despair which made life a hell. at last came peace, and on 1 August, 1787, as the midday Angelus was ringing, the Saint passed peacefully to his reward. He had nearly completed his ninety-first year. He was declared "Venerable," 4 May, 1796; was beatified in 1816, and canonized in 1839. In 1871, he was declared a Doctor of the Church. "Alphonsus was of middle height," says his first biographer, Tannoia; "his head was rather large, his hair black, and beard well-grown." He had a;pleasant smile, and his conversation was very agreeable, yet he had great dignity of manner. He was a born leader of men. His devotion to the Blessed Sacrament and to Our Lady was extraordinary. He had a tender charity towards all who were in trouble; he would go to any length to try to save a vocation; he would expose himself to death to prevent sin. He had a love for the lower animals, and wild creatures who fled from all else would come to him as to a friend. Psychologically, Alphonsus may be classed among twice-born souls; that is to say, there was a definitely marked break or conversion, in his life, in which he turned, not from serious sin, for that he never comitted, but from comparative worldliness, to thorough self-sacrifice for God. Alphonsus's temperament was very ardent. He was a man of strong passions, using the term in the philosophic sense, and tremendous energy, but from childhood his passions were under control. Yet, to take anger alone, though comparatively early in life he seemed dead to insult or injury which affected himself, in cases of cruelty, or of injustice to others, or of dishonour to God, he showed a prophet's indignation even in old age. Ultimately, however, anything merely human in this had disappeared. At the worst, it was only the scaffolding by which the temple of perfection was raised. Indeed, apart from those who become saints by the altogether special grace of martyrdom, it may be doubted if many men and women of phlegmatic temperament have been canonized. The differentia of saints is not faultlessness but driving-power, a driving-power exerted in generous self-sacrifice and ardent love of God. The impulse to this passionate service of God comes from Divine grace, but the soul must correspond (which is also a grace of God), and the soul of strong will and strong passions corresponds best. The difficulty about strong wills and strong passions is that they are hard to tame, but when they are tamed they are the raw material of sanctity.

Not less remarkable than the intensity with which Alphonsus worked is the amount of work he did. His perseverance was indomitable. He both made and kept a vow not to lose a single moment of time. He was helped in this by his turn of mind which was extremely practical. Though a good dogmatic theologian—a fact which has not been sufficiently recognized—he was not a metaphysician like the great scholastics. He was a lawyer, not only during his years at the Bar, but throughout his whole life—a lawyer, who to skilled advocacy and an enormous knowledge of practical detail added a wide and luminous hold of underlying principles. It was this which made him the prince of moral theologians, and gained him, when canonization made it possible, the title of "Doctor of the Church." This combination of practical common sense with extraordinary energy in administrative work ought to make Alphonsus, if he were better known, particularly attractive to the English-speaking nations, especially as he is so modern a saint. But we must not push resemblances too far. If in some things Alphonsus was an Anglo-Saxon, in others he was a Neapolitan of the Neapolitans, though always a saint. He often writes as a Neapolitan to Neapolitans. Were the vehement things in his letters and writings, especially in the matter of rebuke or complaint, to appraised as if uttered by an Anglo-Saxon in cold blood, we might be surprised and even shocked. Neapolitan students, in an animated but amicable discussion, seem to foreign eyes to be taking part in a violent quarrel. St. Alphonsus appeared a miracle of calm to Tannoia. Could he have been what an Anglo-Saxon would consider a miracle of calm, he would have seemed to his companions absolutely inhuman. The saints are not inhuman but real men of flesh and blood, however much some hagiographers may ignore the fact.

While the continual intensity of reiterated acts of virtue which we have called driving-power is what really creates sanctity, there is another indispensable quality. The extreme difficulty of the lifelong work of fashioning a saint consists precisely in this, that every act of virtue the saint performs goes to strengthen his character, that is, his will. On the other hand, ever since the Fall of Man, the will of man has been his greatest danger. It has a tendency at every moment to deflect, and if it does deflect from the right path, the greater the momentum the more terrible the final crash. Now the saint has a very great momentum indeed, and a spoiled saint is often a great villain.

To prevent the ship going to pieces on the rocks, it has need of a very responsive rudder, answering to the slightest pressure of Divine guidance. The rudder is humility, which, in the intellect, is a realization of our own unworthiness, and in the will, docility to right guidance. But how was Alphonsus to grow in this so necessary virtue when he was in authority nearly all his life? The answer is that God kept him humble by interior trials. From his earliest years he had an anxious fear about committing sin which passed at times into scruple.

He who ruled and directed others so wisely, had, where his own soul was concerned, to depend on obedience like a little child. To supplement this, God allowed him in the last years of his life to fall into disgrace with the pope, and to find himself deprived of all external authority, trembling at times even for his eternal salvation. St. Alphonsus does not offer as much directly to the student of mystical theology as do some contemplative saints who have led more retired lives. Unfortunately, he was not obliged by his confessor, in virtue of holy obedience, as St. Teresa was, to write down his states of prayer; so we do not know precisely what they were. The prayer he recommended to his Congregation, of which we have beautiful examples in his ascetical works, is affective; the use of short aspirations, petitions, and acts of love, rather than discursive meditation with long reflection. His own prayer was perhaps for the most part what some call "active," others "ordinary," contemplation. Of extraordinary passive states, such as rapture, there are not many instances recorded in his life, though there are some. At three different times in his missions, while preaching, a ray of light from a picture of Our Lady darted towards him, and he fell into an ecstasy before the people. In old age he was more than once raised in the air when speaking of God.

His intercession healed the sick; he read the secrets of hearts, and foretold the future. He fell into a clairvoyant trance at Arienzo on 21 September, 1774, and was present in spirit at the death-bed in Rome of Pope Clement XIV.

It was comparatively late in life that Alphonsus became a writer. If we except a few poems published in 1733 (the Saint was born in 1696), his first work, a tiny volume called "Visits to the Blessed Sacrament," only appeared in 1744 or 1745, when he was nearly fifty years old. Three years later he published the first sketch of his "Moral Theology" in a single quarto volume called "Annotations to Busembaum," a celebrated Jesuit moral theologian. He spent the next few years in recasting this work, and in 1753 appeared the first volume of the "Theologia Moralis," the second volume, dedicated to Benedict XIV, following in 1755. Nine editions of the "Moral Theology" appeared in the Saint's life-time, those o f 1748, 1753–1755, 1757, 1760, 1763, 1767, 1773, 1779, and 1785, the "Annotations to Busembaum" counting as the first. In the second edition the work received the definite form it has since retained, though in later issues the Saint retracted a number of opinions, corrected minor ones, and worked at the statement of his theory of Equiprobabilism till at last he considered it complete. In addition, he published many editions of compendiums of his larger work, such as the "Homo Apostolicus," made in 1759. The "Moral Theology," after a historical introduction by the Saint's friend, P. Zaccaria, S.J., which was omitted, however, from the eighth and ninth editions, begins with a treatise "De Conscientia," followed by one "De Legibus." These form the first book of the work, while the second contains the treatises on Faith, Hope, and Charity. The third book deals with the Ten Commandments, the fourth with the monastic and clerical states, and the duties of judges, advocates, doctors, merchants, and others. The fifth book has two treatises "De Actibus Humanis" and "De Peccatis"; the sixth is on the sacraments, the seventh and last on the censures of the Church.

St. Alphonsus as a moral theologian occupies the golden mean between the schools tending either to laxity or to rigour which divided the theological world of his time. When he was preparing for the priesthood in Naples, his masters were of the rigid school, for though the center of Jansenistic disturbance was in northern Europe, no shore was so remote as not to feel the ripple of its waves. When the Saint began to hear confessions, however, he soon saw the harm done by rigorism, and for the rest of his life he inclined more to the mild school of the Jesuit theologians, whom he calls "the masters of morals." St. Alphonsus, however, did not in all things follow their teaching, especially on one point much debated in the schools; namely, whether we may in practice follow an opinion which denies a moral obligation, when the opinion which affirms a moral obligation seems to us to be altogether more probable. This is the great question of "Probabilism." St. Alphonsus, after publishing anonymously (in 1749 and 1755) two treatises advocating the right to follow the less probable opinion, in the end decided against that lawfulness, and in case of doubt only allowed freedom from obligation where the opinions for and against the law were equal or nearly equal. He called his system Equiprobabilism. It is true that theologians even of the broadest school are agreed that, when an opinion in favour of the law is so much more probable as to amount practically to moral certainty, the less probable opinion cannot be followed, and some have supposed that St. Alphonsus meant no more than this by his terminology. According to this view he chose a different formula from the Jesuit writers, partly because he thought his own terms more exact, and, partly to save his teaching and his congregation as far as possible from the State persecution which after 1764 had already fallen so heavily on the Society of Jesus, and in 1773 was formally to suppress it. It is a matter for friendly controversy, but it seems there was a real difference, though not as great in practice as is supposed, between the Saint's later teaching and that current in the Society. Alphonsus was a lawyer, and as a lawyer he attached much importance to the weight of evidence. In a civil action a serious preponderance of evidence gives one side the case. If civil courts could not decide against a defendant on greater probability, but had to wait, as a criminal court must wait, for moral certainty, many actions would never be decided at all. St. Alphonsus likened the conflict between law and liberty to a civil action in which the law has the onus probandi, although greater probabilities give it a verdict. Pure probabilism likens it to a criminal trial, in which the jury must find in favour of liberty (the prisoner at the bar) if any single reasonable doubt whatever remain in its favour. Furthermore, St. Alphonsus was a great theologian, and so attached much weight to intrinsic probability. He was not afraid of making up his mind. "I follow my conscience," he wrote in 1764, "and when reason persuades me I make little account of moralists." To follow an opinion in favour of liberty without weighing it, merely because it is held by someone else, would have seemed to Alphonsus an abdication of the judicial office with which as a confessor he was invested. Still it must in fairness be admitted that all priests are not great theologians able to estimate intrinsic probability at its true worth, and the Church herself might be held to have conceded something to pure probabilism by the unprecedented honours she paid to the Saint in her Decree of 22 July, 1831, which allows confessors to follow any of St. Alphonsus's own opinions without weighing the reasons on which they were based.

Besides his Moral Theology, the Saint wrote a large number of dogmatic and ascetical works nearly all in the vernacular. The "Glories of Mary," "The Selva," "The True Spouse of Christ," "The Great Means of Prayer," "The Way of Salvation," "Opera Dogmatica, or History of the Council of Trent," and "Sermons for all the Sundays in the Year," are the best known. He was also a poet and musician. His hymns are justly celebra ted in Italy. Quite recently, a duet composed by him, between the Soul and God, was found in the British Museum bearing the date 1760 and containing a correction in his own handwriting.

Finally, St. Alphonsus was a wonderful letter-writer, and the mere salvage of his correspondence amounts to 1,451 letters, filling three large volumes. It is not necessary to notice certain non-Catholic attacks on Alphonsus as a patron of lying. St. Alphonsus was so scrupulous about truth that when, in 1776, the regalist, Mgr. Filingeri, was made Archbishop of Naples, the Saint would not write to congratulate the new primate, even at the risk of making another powerful enemy for his persecuted Congregation, because he thought he could not honestly say he "was glad to hear of the appointment." It will be remembered that even as a young man his chief distress at his breakdown in court was the fear that his mistake might be ascribed to deceit. The question as to what does or does not constitute a lie is not an easy one, but it is a subject in itself. Alphonsus said nothing in his "Moral Theology" which is not the common teaching of Catholic theologians.

Very few remarks upon his own times occur in the Saint's letters. The eighteenth century was one series of great wars; that of the Spanish, Polish, and Austrian Succession; the Seven Years' War, and the War of American Independence, ending with the still more gigantic struggles in Europe, which arose out of the events of 1789. Except in '45, in all of these, down to the first shot fired at Lexington, the English-speaking world was on one side and the Bourbon States, including Naples, on the other. But to all this secular history about the only reference in the Saint's correspondence which has come down to us is a sentence in a letter of April, 1744, which speaks of the passage of the Spanish troops who had come to defend Naples against the Austrians. He was more concerned with the spiritual conflict which was going on at the same time. The days were indeed evil. Infidelity and impiety were gaining ground; Voltaire and Rousseau were the idols of society; and the ancien régime, by undermining religion, its one support, was tottering to its fall. Alphonsus was a devoted friend of the Society of Jesus and its long persecution by the Bourbon Courts, ending in its suppression in 1773, filled him with grief. He died on the very eve of the great Revolution which was to sweep the persecutors away, having seen in vision the woes which the French invasion of 1798 was to bring on Naples.

An interesting series of portraits might be painted of those who play a part in the Saint's history: Charles III and his minister Tanucci; Charle's son Ferdinand, and Ferdinand's strange and unhappy Queen, Maria Carolina, daughter of Maria Teresa and sister of Marie Antoinette; Cardinals Spinelli, Sersale, and Orsini; Popes Benedict XIV, Clement XIII, Clement XIV, and Pius VI, to each of whom Alphonsus dedicated a volume of his works. Even the baleful shadow of Voltaire falls across the Saint's life, for Alphonsus wr ote to congratulate him on a conversion, which alas, never took place! Again, we have a friendship of thirty years with the great Venetian publishing house of Remondini, whose letters from the Saint, carefully preserved as became business men, fill a quarto volume. Other personal friends of Alphonsus were the Jesuit Fathers de Matteis, Zaccaria, and Nonnotte.

A respected opponent was the redoubtable Dominican controversialist, P. Vincenzo Patuzzi, while to make up for hard blows we have another Dominican, P. Caputo, President of Alphonsus's seminary and a devoted helper in his work of reform. To come to saints, the great Jesuit missionary St. Francis di Geronimo took the little Alphonsus in his arms, blessed him, and prophesied that he would do great work for God; while a Franciscan, St. John Joseph of the Cross, was well known to Alphonsus in later life. Both of them were canonized on the same day as the Holy Doctor, 26 May, 1839. St. Paul of the Cross (1694–1775) and St. Alphonsus, who were altogether contemporaries, seem never to have met on earth, though the founder of the Passionists was a great friend of Alphonsus's uncle, Mgr. Cavalieri, himself a great servant of God. Other saints and servants of God were those of Alphonsus's own household, the lay brother, St. Gerard Majella, who died in 1755, and Januarius Sarnelli, Cfsar Sportelli, Dominic Blasucci, and Maria Celeste, all of whom have been declared "Venerable" by the Church.

Blessed Clement Hofbauer joined the Redemptorist congregation in the aged Saint's lifetime, though Alphonsus never saw in the flesh the man whom he knew would be the second founder of his Order. Except for the chances of European war, England and Naples were then in different worlds, but Alphonsus may have seen at the side of Don Carlos when he conquered Naples in 1734, an English boy of fourteen who had already shown great gallantry under fire and was to play a romantic part in history, Prince Charles Edward Stuart. But one may easily overcrowd a narrow canvas and it is better in so slight a sketch to leave the central figure in solitary relief. If any reader of this article will go to original sources and study the Saint's life at greater length, he will not find his labour thrown away.

Much of the material for a complete life of St. Alphonsus is still in manuscript in the Roman archives of the Redemptorist Congregation and in the archives of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. The foundation of all subsequent lives is the Della vita ed istituto del venerabile Alfonso Maria Liguori, of ANTONY TANNOIA, one of the great biographies of literature. Tannoia was born about 1724 and entered the Redemptorist Congregation in 1746. As he did not die till 1808 (his work appeared in 1799) he was a companion of the Saint for over forty years and an eyewitness of much that he relates. Even where he is not that, he may generally be trusted, as he was a Boswell in collecting facts. His life contains a number of minor inaccuracies, however, and is seriously defective in its account of the founding of his Congregation and of the troubles which fell on it in 1780. Tannoia, also, through some mental idiosyncrasy, manages to give the misleading impression that St. Alphonsus was severe. There is a somewhat unsatisfactory French translation of Tannoia's work. Mimoires sur la vie et la congrigation de St. Alphonse de Liguori (Paris, 1842, 3 vols.). The English translation in the Oratory Series is also rather inadequate. A justly celebrated life is the Vie et Institut de Saint Alphonse-Marie de Li guori, in four volumes, by CARDINAL VILLECOURT, (Tournai, 1893). The German life, DILGSKRON, Leben des heiligen Bischofs und Kirchenlehrers, Alfonsus Maria de Liguori (New York, 1887), is scholarly and accurate. CARDINAL CAPECELATRO has also written a life of the Saint, La Vita di Sant' Alfonso Maria de Liguori (Rome, 2 vols.). The latest life, BERTHE, Saint Alphonse de Liguori (Paris, 1900, 2 vols. . SVO), gives an extremely full and picturesque account of the Saint's life and times. This has recently been translated into English with additions and corrections (Dublin, 2 vols., royal SVO); DUMORTIER, Les premihres Redemptoristines (Lille, 1886), and Le Phre Antoine-Marie Tannoia (Paris, 1902), contain some useful information; as does BERRUTI, Lo Spirito di S. Alfonso Maria de Liguori, 3 ed. (Rome, 1896). The Saint's own letters are of extreme value in supplementing Tannoia. A centenary edition, Lettere di S. Alfonso Maria de'Liguori (ROME, 1887, 3 vols.), was published by P. KUNTZ, C.SS.R., director of the Roman archives of his Congregation. An English translation in five volumes is included in the 22 volumes of the American centenary edition of St. Alphonsus's ascetical works (New York). There are many editions of the Saint's Moral Theology; the best and lat est is that of P. GAUDI, C.SS.R. (Rome, 1905). The Saint's complete dogmatic works have been translated into Latin by P. WALTER, C.SS.R., S. Alphonsi Mariae de Liguori Ecclesiae Doctoris Opera Dogmatica, (New York, 1903, 2 vols., 4to). See also HASSALL, The Balance of Power (1715–89) (London, 1901); COLLETTA, History of the Kingdom of Naples, 1734–1825, 2 vols., tr. by S. HORNER (Edinburgh, 1858); VON REUMONT, Die Carafa von Maddaloni (Berlin, 1851, 2 vols.); JOHNSTON, The Napoleonic Empire in South Italy, 2 vols. (London, 1904). Colletta's book gives the best general picture of the time, but is marred by anti-clerical bias.

DOCTOR OF THE CHURCH, a.d. 1787

St ALPHONSUS was born at Marianella, near Naples, on September 27, 1696; his parents were Don Joseph de Liguori, captain of the royal gallies, and Donna Anna Cavalieri, whose elder brother became bishop of Troia and was a friend of St Paul-of-the-Cross: both people of virtuous and distinguished life. The boy was baptised Alphonsus Mary Antony John Francis Cosmas Damian Michael Gaspar, but preferred in after-life to call himself simply Alfonso Maria; the use of the Latin form of his name has become usual in English. Don Joseph was determined that his first-born should have every advantage that formal education could give him, and he was early put under tutors. He learned Greek, Latin, and French, the rudiments of mathematics, physical science and architecture, drawing and painting, riding and swordsmanship, and became an accomplished musician, especially a player of the harpsichord. At thirteen he began the study of jurisprudence, and when sixteen he was allowed, by dispensation of four years, to present himself before the university of Naples for examination for the doctor's degree in both laws (civil and canon); it was granted him with acclamation. For two years Alphonsus was pupil of two distinguished Neapolitan lawyers, Perrone and Jovene, and in 1715 he was called to the Bar. In the same year he admitted to the spiritual confraternity of the Doctors, which was directed by the Oratorians. His reputation as a barrister is testified by the tradition (not certainly true) that in eight years of he never lost a case. In 1717 Don Joseph arranged a marriage for his son, but it came to nothing and Alphonsus continued to work diligently and quietly; for a year or two some slackness in religious care was observable, coupled with and perhaps due to an affection for "society life "and fashionable amusements, but he had the will to avoid serious sin. He was very fond of the music of the theatre, but music was not the only thing on the Neapolitan stage of eighteenth century; however, Alphonsus was very short-sighted and when the curtain went up his spectacles came off, and so he was able to enjoy the good without receiving harm from the dangerous. A retreat with the Lazarists during the Lent of 1722 and reception of the sacrament of Confirmation in the following autumn steadied him and revived his fervour, and at the next Lent he made a private resolution not to marry and to continue in his profession only until it should appear that God wished him to abandon it. What he took to be a clear indication of the divine will was shown him only a few months later.

A certain Neapolitan nobleman (whose name has not come down to us) was suing the Grand Duke of Tuscany for possession of an estate valued at over 100,ooo pounds. Alphonsus was briefed in the case, for which side we do not now know, but probably for his countryman, and made a great speech on his client's behalf which much impressed the court. When he sat down opposing counsel coolly remarked, "You have wasted your breath. You have disregarded the evidence on which the whole case depends." "What do you mean? Where? How?" asked Alphonsus. He was handed a document which he had read through several times, but with a passage marked that had entirely escaped his notice. The point at issue was whether the estate was held under Lombard law or under the Angevin capitularies: this clause made the point clear, and decided against the client of Alphonsus. For a moment he was silent. Then he said, "I have made a mistake. The case is yours," and left the court, murmuring to himself, "Now I know you, 0 world! These courts shall not see me again!" He was as good as his word, and, braving the fiery indignation of his father, refused either to go on with his profession or to entertain a second project for his marriage. While visiting the sick in the hospital for incurables he twice heard as it were an interior voice, saying, "Leave the world, and give yourself to me"; he went straight to the church of our Lady of Ransom, laid his sword on her altar, and then offered himself to the priests of the Oratory. Don Joseph tried every way to dissuade his son, but was at last constrained to agree to his being a priest, provided that, instead of joining the Oratory, he should stay at home. On the advice of his director, Father Pagano, himself an Oratorian, Alphonsus accepted this condition.

He began his theological studies at home, and at the end of 1724 received minor orders. He thereupon was admitted to the Society of Propaganda, a local missionary-training congregation, and also joined the society called White Fathers whose particular work was ministering to criminals condemned to death. After being ordained deacon the Archbishop of Naples licensed him to preach in any church of the city, and in 1726 he was advanced to the priesthood. For the two following years he was engaged in missionary work throughout the kingdom of Naples, and at once made his mark. The early eighteenth century was a time of pompous oratory and florid verbosity in the pulpit—a fruit of the Renaissance out of control,—and of rigorism in the confessional—a fruit of Jansénism; Don Alphonsus repudiated both these characteristics. He preached simply and without affectation: " It is a pleasure to listen to your sermons; you forget yourself and preach Jesus Christ," somebody said to him, and he afterwards instructed his missioners: "Your style must be simple, but the sermon must be skilfully constructed. If skill is lacking it is unconnected and tasteless; if it be bombastic, the simple cannot understand it. I have never preached a sermon which the poorest old woman in the congregation could not understand." He treated his penitents as souls to be saved rather than as criminals to be punished or frightened into better ways; he is said never to have refused absolution to a penitent. This was not pleasing to everybody, and some looked with suspicion on Don Alphonsus. He organised the lazzaroni of Naples into groups which met for instruction in Christian doctrine and virtue; one of the members was reproved by Don Alphonsus for his imprudent fasting, and another priest added, "It is God's will that we should eat in order to live. If you are given cutlets, eat them and be thankful. They will do you good." The remark was taken up and twisted into matter of offence: the clubs were secret societies of Epicureans, of Quietists, of some other heresy, there was a new sect, of Cutlets. The solemn wiseacres of Church and State took the matter up, arrests were made, and Don Alphonsus had to make explanations. The Archbishop counselled him to be more careful, the "Cutlet clubs" continued undisturbed, and developed into the great Association of the Chapels which numbers thousands of working-men who meet daily for prayer and instruction in the confraternity chapels. In 1729, being then thirty-three years old, Alphonsus left his father's house to become chaplain to the College of the Holy Family, recently founded by Don Matthew Ripa for the training of missionaries to China. Here he met Thomas Falcoia, and became friendly with him; he was a priest twice his own age, whose life had been devoted to trying to establish a new religious institute in accordance with a vision he claimed to have had in Rome. All he had succeeded in doing was to establish a convent of nuns at Scala, Amalfi, to whom he had given a version of the rule of the Visitandines. One of the nuns, however, Sister Mary Celeste, alleged that she had received a revelation of the rule which the nuns were to follow, and when Father Falcoia discovered that its provisions tallied with those intimated to him twenty years before he was naturally impressed. In 1724 he proposed that this new rule should be adopted by the community, but there was a minority strongly opposed to it. This minority appealed to Father Falcoia's superior (he was a member of the congregation of Pii Operarii) who ruled that Sister Mary Celeste had been deceived, that no alteration in their life should be made, and that Father Falcoia should cease to direct the convent.

This was the position when, six years later, Falcoia got St Alphonsus interested in the matter. About the same time a n unexpected turn was given to events by his appointment to the see of Castellaznare; this left him free to associate himself with the convent of Scala again, and one of his first episcopal acts was to invite Alphonsus to give a retreat to the nuns, a step that had far-reaching consequences for everybody concerned.

With his two friends John Mazzini and Vincent Mannarini, St Alphonsus went to Scala in September 1730, and after conducting a novena in the cathedral, betook himself to the convent; in addition to giving the retreat he investigated, with a lawyer's precision, the matter of Sister Mary Celeste's revelation, and came to the conclusion that it was from God and not an hallucination. He therefore recommended, and the nuns agreed, that the convent should be re-organized in accordance with the vision, and the Bishop of Scala gave his consent; there were still difficulties to be overcome, but on the feast of the Transfiguration 1731 the nuns put on their new habit, of red and blue, and entered upon their strictly enclosed and penitential life. Thus began the Redemptoristines, who still flourish in several lands. The new rule had been expanded and made more explicit by St Alphonsus himself, who took over responsibility for their direction from the aged Mgr. Falcoia. No sooner was this brought about than the Bishop of Castellamare intimated to Don Alphonsus that he should now undertake the establishment of a new congregation of missionaries to work especially among the peasants of the country districts: his own original vision had included an institute of men and further revelations to that effect were attributed to Sister Mary Celeste. Alphonsus knew there was room for much work, but he was already committed to the Society of Propaganda and so referred the question to his director; rather unexpectedly Father Pagano approved of the Bishop's project and told Alphonsus to undertake it. The next twelve months were given over to facing a storm of opposition: his colleagues of the Propaganda Society and even his friends, Father Ripa and Canon Gizzio, violently objected to the scheme, while, in addition to Father Pagano, the Jesuit provincial, Manulio, the Lazarist superior, Cutica, and a learned Dominican, Fiorillo, supported it. At last, after a long and painful leave-taking with his father, St Alphonsus left Naples in November 1732 and went to Scala. There the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (which for its first seventeen years was known as "of the Most Holy Saviour") was born on the 9th of that month, and its first home was in a small house belonging to the convent of nuns. There were seven postulants under Alphonsus, with Mgr. Falcoia as informal superior general, and dissensions began at once, centring chiefly in this very matter of who was in supreme authority; a party opposed the Bishop, and consequently Alphonsus, and a schism was formed in both houses. Sister Mary Celeste went off to found a convent at Foggia, and at the end of five months St Alphonsus was alone but for one lay-brother. But other subjects came, a larger house became necessary, and in the autumn of 1733 successful missions were given in the diocese of Amalfi. In the following January a second foundation was made, at the request of the Bishop of Cajazzo, at Villa degli Schiavi, and here Alphonsus went to reside, and conducted missions. The saint is so well known as a moral theologian, for his writings, and for his efforts in founding the Redemptorists, that his eminence as a missioner has been overshadowed; but from 1726 till 1752 he was preaching up and down the kingdom of Naples, especially in villages and rural settlements, and with the greatest success. His confessional was crowded, hardened sinners returned to the healing sacraments in great numbers, enemies were reconciled, family feuds healed, and he established the practice, characteristic of the method of his followers, of returning some months after a mission was closed in order to confirm and consolidate the work.

But the troubles of the young Redemptorists were not over: indeed they had hardly begun. In the same year as the foundation at Villa degli Schiavi, Spain re-asserted its authority over Naples, the absolutist Charles III was in power, and he had as his prime minister the Marquis Bernard Tanucci, who was to be the lifelong opponent of the new congregation. A third house was started at Ciorani, between Salerno and Avellino, but in 1737 a priest of bad character spread evil reports about the establishment at Villa, the community was attacked by armed men, and it was deemed wise to close the house; in the following year troubles caused Scala too to be abandoned. On the other hand Cardinal Spinelli, Archbishop of Naples, put St Alphonsus at the head of a general mission throughout his diocese, and for two years the saint organized and conducted this, until the death of Mgr. Falcoia in 1743 recalled him to the work of the congregation. A general chapter was held, at which St Alphonsus was elected rector major (i.e., superior general), vows were taken, and rules and constitutions were drawn up. They were now constituted as a religious institute and proceeded in the following years to make foundations at Nocera de' Pagani, Deliceto, and Caposele, all under great difficulties of local and official opposition; "regalism" was in the ascendant and the implacable anticlericalism of Tanucci was a sword at all times threatening the existence of the congregation. There was no question of getting the royal approbation for it, in spite of the efforts of Alphonsus, and when in 1749 Pope Benedict XIV approved the constitutions of the new institute the exequatur to the papal brief was refused by the King of the Two Sicilies, who only a short time before had wished to make its founder archbishop of Palermo.

The first edition of the Moral Theology of St Alphonsus, in the form of annotations to the work of Busembaum, a Jesuit theologian, was published at Naples in 1748, with the imprimatur of both the King and the Archbishop;* and the second edition, which is properly the first of his own complete work, in 1753–5. It was approved by Pope Benedict XIV and had an immediate success, for with consummate wisdom it steered a middle course between the rigorism of Jansenism and an improper laxity; seven more editions were called for in the author's lifetime. There is no need here to follow the controversy concerning "probabilism," with which the name of St Alphonsus is associated. Probabilism is the system in moral theology which holds that, if of two opinions, one insists that in certain circumstances a law binds, while the other holds that in these circumstances it does not, one is allowed to follow an opinion favouring liberty provided it be truly and solidly probable, even though the opinion favouring the law be more probable. St Alphonsus eventually favoured what he called Aequiprobabilism, which insists that the law must be obeyed unless the opinion favouring liberty is at least nearly equally probable with that favouring the law, though there would appear to be little practical difference between the two systems. The Church permits the application of either, but the reader may be reminded that Probabilism is primarily a principle for the moral theologian and is not put forward as an ideal of Christian life; often the more perfect and therefore more desirable course of action is to follow the more probable opinion according to which the law is binding. Attempts have been made to impugn the morality of the teaching of St Alphonsus about lying: his was the ordinary teaching of the church, namely, that all lies are intrinsically wrong and illicit. The Holy See's estimate of him as a moral theologian is shown by a decree of the Sacred Penitentiary in 1831 which allows confessors to follow any of his opinions, without considering the grounds on which they are based. Among the consequences of the teachings of the Jansenists was that holy Communion can be received worthily only very rarely and that devotion to our Lady is a useless superstition; St Alphonsus vigorously attacked both these errors, the last-named particularly by the publication in 1750 of The Glories of Mary. To many readers this famous book has seemed in parts exaggerated, but it must be borne in mind that it was written in answer to certain people who were trying to "regulate" devotion to our Lady in such a way as to do away with it altogether; and that it was intended for people who were sufficiently intelligent to distinguish between metaphorical and literal language, and who were well enough instructed in their religion to know that all the glories of Mary are "for the sake of her Son." Among his numerous other works for which he was recognized as a doctor of the Church are The True Spouse of Jesus Christ, The Great Means of Prayer, The Way of Salvation, The Admirable Workings of Divine Providence, a nd a history of the Council of Trent.

From the time of the death of Mgr. Falcoia, St Alphonsus led a life of extraordinary industry: guiding and fostering his new congregation through troubles both external and internal, trying to get it authorized by the King, ministering to individual souls, conducting missions all over Naples and Sicily, even finding time to write hymns, compose music, and paint pictures. After 1752 his health was failing, his missionary vigour decreased, and he devoted much more time to writing. The general opinion of him was voiced by a prebendary of Naples, "If I were the Pope I would canonize him without process." "He fulfilled in a most perfect way," said Father Mazzini, "the divine precept of loving God above all things, with his whole heart and with all his strength, as all might have seen and as I saw better than anyone during the long years I spent with him. The love of God shone forth in all his acts and words, in his devout manner of speaking of Him, his recollection, his deep devotion before the Blessed Sacrament, and his continual exercise of the divine presence." He was strict, but tender and compassionate, and, often suffering acutely from scrupulosity himself, was particularly pitiful to others afflicted in the same way. His one remedy was implicit obedience to one's confessor, as is shown clearly in his letters to Father Rizzi, a priest of knowledge and good judgement who was, nevertheless, tormented by distressing scruples (this unfortunate man once wrote to a bishop, who was his penitent, advising him on a dispute that he had with his diocese. The bishop threatened to imprison him!). Father Cajone testified during the process of beatification of St Alphonsus that "His special and characteristic virtue seemed to me to be purity of intention. In all things and at all times he acted for God without any admixture of self. He said to us one day, 'By the grace of God I have never confessed having acted from passion. It may be that I have not noticed what was passing in me, but I have not remarked it so as to confess it.'" This is the more remarkable when it is considered that Alphonsus was a Neapolitan, and by nature passionate and precipitate, easily moved by anger, pride, or a sudden resolve.

When he was sixty-six years old St Alphonsus was made by Pope Clement XIII Bishop of Sant' Agata de' Goti, between Benevento and Capua. It was an honour entirely unexpected and unwanted: when the messenger of the nuncio apostolic presented himself at Nocera, greeted him as "Most Illustrious Lord," and handed over the letter announcing the appointment, Alphonsus read it through and handed it back, saying, "Please do not come back again with any more of your 'Most Illustrious'; it would be the death of me." But the Pope would take no refusal, and he was consecrated in the church of the Minerva at Rome. Sant' Agata was only a small diocese, but that was about all that could be said in its favour; it numbered 30,000 souls with 17 religious houses and 400 secular priests, of whom some did no pastoral work at all, living on the proceeds of an easy benefice, and others were not only slack but positively evil-living. The laity were to match, and rapidly getting worse; the results of nearly thirty years of neglect were apparent on all sides. After having established his own modest household, the new Bishop sent out a band of priests to conduct a general mission throughout the diocese: they were recruited from all orders and institutes in Naples except, for reasons of tact and prudence, his own congregation of Redemptorists. Alphonsus recommended two things only to these missioners, simplicity in the pulpit, charity in the confessional, and after hearing one of the priests neglect his advice he said to him, "Your sermon kept me awake all night. . . . If you wanted to preach only yourself, rather than Jesus Christ, why come all the way from Naples to Ariola to do it?" At the same time he set about a reform of the seminary, which had plenty of candidates but many of doubtful character, was housed in an unhealthy building, and suffered under a rector far too old for the post. "The Church," said St Francis de Sales, "does not need many priests, but she must have good ones," and St Alphonsus would not ordain anyone of whose good character and dispositions he was not personally satisfied. There were numerous benefices without cure of souls in the diocese, and he had to exercise an unremitting vigilance that personal influence was not brought to bear in granting them, and lest they were given to men of poor qualification on the plea that they were needy and could not do much harm. Some priests were in the habit of saying Mass in fifteen minutes or less; these were suspended ipso facto until they amended their ways, and the Bishop wrote a moving treatise on the subject "'The priest at the altar,' says St Cyprian, 'represents the person of Jesus Christ.' But whom do so many priests to-day represent? They represent only mountebanks earning their livelihood by their antics. Most lamentable of all is it to see religious, and some even of reformed orders, say Mass with such haste and such mutilation of the rite as would scandalize even the heathen. . . . 'Truly the sight of a Mass celebrated in this way is enough to make one lose the Faith.'" After he had been ten months at Sant' Agata St Alphonsus set out on a visitation of his diocese, during which he instructed, catechized and heard confessions in person, and insisted that scandals be put down firmly, whether arising from dirty and unkempt churches or from public wickedness and disorder. He was taken seriously ill at Ariola, and almost immediately after his return a famine broke out, with its usual accompaniment of plague. Alphonsus had foreseen and prophesied this calamity several times in the previous two years, but nothing had been done to avert it. Thousands were literally starving, and he sold everything to buy food for distribution among the sufferers, down to his carriage and mules and his uncle's episcopal ring; the Holy See authorized him to make use of the property of the endowment of the see for the same purpose, and he contracted debts right and left in his efforts at relief. When the mob clamoured for the life of the mayor of Sant' Agata, who was wrongfully accused of withholding food, Alphonsus braved their fury, offered his own life for that of the mayor, and finally distracted them by distributing the rations of the next two days. The Bishop was most vigorous in his concern for public morality; he always began with kindness, but when amendment was not promised or relapse occurred he took strong measures, invoking the help of the civil authorities. This made him many enemies, and several times his life was in danger from people of rank and others against whom he instituted proceedings. The custom of the courts of banishing hardened offenders, whether public vagabonds or private sinners, must have pressed somewhat hardly on the districts to which they went, and the bishops of neighbouring dioceses probably found scant consolation in the observation of the Bishop of Sant' Agata that, "Each must look after his own flock. When these people find themselves turned out everywhere, in disgrace and without food or shelter, they will come to their senses and give up their sinful lives."

Just before the suppression of the Jesuits in the Spanish dominions in 1767 a determined effort was made to disperse the still struggling Redemptorists. It was led by the powerful Don Francis Maffei, who had a grudge against the fathers at Deliceto because they remained neutral in a dispute he had with the local municipality, and Baron Sarnelli, who also had a personal grievance. The religious were denounced to the King as "degenerated . . . dominated by a spirit of greed. . . . They multiply properties and build magnificent monasteries. They eclipse even the Jesuits in their luxury and ostentation . . . they excite the people to rebel against their lords." Other charges and claims were added to this nonsensical indictment, and St Alphonsus went to Naples to defend his brethren. This was more than his opponents had bargained for, and when the case at last came on in the royal court the plaintiffs did not appear. But the judge would not enter judgement for the Redemptorists; instead he adjourned the case sine die, and Alphonsus returned to Arienzo, where he was living. He now set himself to answer the writings of Mgr. von Hontheim (" Febronius"), a German bishop who taught an exaggerated Gallicanism, opposing the authority of princes, bishops and councils to that of the Holy See. In the circumstances the Vindication of the Supreme Power of the Roman Pontiff had to be printed secretly in Naples, published privately and anonymously, and a few copies smuggled out of the country, even though Febronianism had already been condemned by the Pope. In June I767 St Alphonsus was attacked by terrible rheumatic pains which developed into an illness from which he was not expected to recover: not only did he receive the last sacraments but preparations were begun for his funeral. After twelve months his life was saved, but he was left with a permanent and incurable bending of the neck, familiar from the portraits of him; until the surgeons had succeeded in straightening it a little the pressure of the chin caused a raw wound in his chest and he was unable to celebrate Mass, which afterwards he could do with the aid of a chair at the communion. In addition to attacks on his moral theology, he had to face an accusation against the Redemptorists of carrying on the Society of Jesus under another name, and in 1770 the Sarnelli action came on again; this time the prime minister, Tanucci, intervened and appointed a commission to draw up a report. The case dragged on for another thirteen years before it was decided in favour of Alphonsus on all counts. Pope Clement XIV died on September 22, 1774,* and St Alphonsus in the following year petitioned his successor, Pius VI, for permission to resign his see. Similar petitions had been refused by Clement XIII and XIV, but the effects of his rheumatic fever were now taken into consideration, permission was granted, and the aged Bishop retired to his Redemptorist's cell at Nocera, hoping to end his days in peace.

But it was not to be. In 1777 the procurator in the Sarnelli case issued his report, a vicious document in which Alphonsus was not only charged with having illegally founded a religious body but with undermining Christian morality by his impious doctrines, "built up entirely from Jesuit authors"; Probabilism must be destroyed and the Redemptorists should be suppressed as simply Jesuits in disguise.+

St Alphonsus at once applied himself to drawing up a detailed refutation. In 1778 Maffei died, ruined by the litigation in which he had deliberately involved himself; he left six children and large debts. These debts were liquidated and these orphans provided for by the efforts of Father Antonio Tannoia, C.SS.R., with the assistance and encouragement of Alphonsus Liguori. Shortly after, Ferdinand di Leon, the procurator, died also, and taking advantage of the resentment which his report on the Redemptorists had aroused among many in Naples, St Alphonsus addressed a brief memoir to the King in defence of the exterior government of his congregation; as a result the established houses, with their superiors and novitiate, were approved. Thus encouraged be determined to make another effort to get the royal sanction for his rule (it was as religious rather than as priests that the congregation was objected to); in addition to the four houses in Naples and one In Sicily, it had now four others in the Papal States, at Scifelli, Frosinone, Sant' Angelo a Cupolo, and Benevento.

What followed was nothing less than tragic. Alphonsus agreed with the royal almoner, Mgr. Testa, to waive any request to be allowed to hold property in common, but otherwise to submit the rule unchanged, and the almoner would put it before the King. Then Testa betrayed him. He altered the rule in many respects, even to the extent of abolishing the vows of religion; he won over to his plot one of the consultors of the congregation, Father Majone, and this altered rule (regolamento) was presented to Alphonsus, written in a small hand and with many erasures. He was old, crippled, deaf, his sight was bad: he read over the familiar opening lines of the document—and signed it. Even his vicar general, Father Andrew Villani, connived at the cruel deception, probably through fear of the others. The King approved the regolamento, it became legally binding, and its provisions were made known to the Redemptorists—and to their founder. The storm broke on him: "You have founded the congregation and you have destroyed it," he was told. For a moment be was indignant with Father Villani: "I never thought I could be so deceived by you, Don Andrew," and then he overwhelmed himself with reproaches for his infirmity and his remissness. "It was my duty to read it myself, but you know I find it difficult to read even a few lines." To refuse to accept the regolamento now would mean suppression of the Redemptorists by the King; to accept it would mean suppression by the Pope, for the Holy See had already approved the original rule. Alphonsus cast about in every direction to save a debacle, but in vain; he would consult the Pope, but the Redemptorists in the Papal States had forestalled him, for they had at once denounced the new rule and put themselves under the protection of the Holy See. Pius VI forbade them to accept the regolamento, and withdrew them from the jurisdiction of St Alphonsus; he provisionally recognized those of the Papal States as the only true Redemptorists, and named Father Francis de Paula their superior general. In 1781 the fathers of Naples accepted the regolamento, with a slight modification which the King had accepted; but this was not acceptable at Rome and the provisional decree was made final. Thus was St Alphonsus excluded from the order which he had founded.

* After saying Mass on the 21st, Alphonsus became unconscious and so remained for twenty-four hours, On coming round he announced that "I have been assisting the Pope, who has just died." This incident is sometimes put forward as an example of bilocation, but seems simply to have been a clairvoyant trance. It was referred to, but no great importance was attached to it in the process of beatification. + This report was drawn up by the supporters of royal supremacy in religious affairs, under the influence of Jansenists.

He bore the humiliation, inflicted by the authority he so loved and respected, with the utmost patience, and without murmuring accepted the apparent end of all his hopes as the will of God. Some followers deserted him and the remaining fathers in the Neapolitan kingdom were reduced to great want and distress, and by some of the bishops were looked on with suspicion and distrust; but in 1783 these same bishops, feeling the effect on their flocks of the loss of the missioners, whose mission faculties had been withdrawn by the Holy See, petitioned for their restoration, which was granted. This was a great consolation to St Alphonsus, who also had the happiness of seeing Father de Paula repentant for the separatist part which he had played. But there was still one more bitter trial for the saint: during the years 1784—85 he went through a terrible "dark night of the soul." He was assailed by temptations against every article of faith and against every virtue, prostrated by scruples and vain fears, and visited by diabolical illusions. For eighteen months this torment lasted, with intervals of light and relief, and was followed by a period when ecstasies were frequent, and prophecy and miracles took the place of interior trials. The end came peacefully on the night of July 31—August 1, 1787, when he was within two months of his ninety-first birthday. Pius VI, the pope who had condemned him under a misapprehension, in 1796 recognized Alphonsus Liguori as a venerable servant of God, in 1816 he was beatified, in 1839 canonized, and in 1871 declared by Pope Pius IX a Doctor of the Church. After the affair of the regolamento St Alphonsus predicted that the separated houses in the Papal States would prosper and spread the Redemptorist congregation and that those who had favoured division would become the advocates of reunion, but that this reunion would not come about till after his death. These predictions were verified; St Clement Hofbauer from Frosinone in 1785 first established the congregation beyond the Alps, and in 1793 the Neapolitan government recognized the original rule and the Redemptorists were again united, with Father Blasucci as rector major. Today they are established as missioners throughout Europe and America, and in several other parts of the world.

1050 These meditations are an excellent summary of the foregoing Considerations on the Last Things of man. As they contain nothing exclusively proper to the days of the week to which they have been assigned, they may also be used at other times.

They are substantially the same as those that are found in the works of Father Sarnelli (Il Cristiano santificato) and in those of St. Leonard of Port Maurice (Via del paradiso), and perhaps elsewhere, since neither appears to be the author of them. St. Alphonsus arranged them according to his own method, and inserted them in the first work that he published, about the year 1747, under the title of "Smaller Spiritual Works" (Operette spirituali).—ED.

1057 "The Rule of Life" was published about the year 1767, in the volume entitled "The Way of Salvation." of which it formed the third part with the treatise called "Darts of Fire." In the general order of the works of Saint Alphonsus it naturally found its place under the title of the present volume that contains the foundation of the spiritual life; it is the complement, the practical conclusion of the Considerations on the eternal truths, as the Author himself so very frequently intimates.—ED.

1070 Quæramus gratiam, et per Mariam quæramus; quia, quod qurerit, invenit, et frustrari non potest.

1071 Here it may be well to mention what the Author himself wrote to his religious, in a circular dated February 26, 1771: "I recommend that for the most part the meditation should be made from my books: The Preparation for Death, Meditation on the Passion, Darts of Fire, which are in the WAY OF SALVATION; and Meditations for Advent, up to the Octave of Epiphany. I say this, not in order to put forward my own poor books, but because these meditations are made up of devout affections, and what is of more importance, are full of holy prayer, of which I do not find many in other books. And hence I beg that the second part of the Meditation, consisting of affections and prayers, be always read."

We must observe that Saint Alphonsus makes the practice of mental prayer simple, clear, easy, and not less fruitful. Owing to the method which he teaches, this exercise, indispensable to him who wishes to sanctify himself, is really put within the reach of all. He wishes that everyone should learn how to meditate. He earnestly recommends that for this purpose special instructions should be given to the people.

Pope Benedict XIV. grants to those who in a church or elsewhere, either in public or private, shall teach the manner of making mental prayer, as well as to those who attend such instruction, a plenary indulgence once' a month, on the day on which they confess and communicate and pray to the intention of the Church; likewise an indulgence of seven years and seven times forty days, each time when, having been truly contrite, and having communicated, they teach mental prayer or attend an explanation that is given to learn how to make it. These indulgences are applicable to the souls in purgatory.—ED.

1074 "Si quid petieritis Patrem in nomine meo, dabit vobis." John, xvI 23.

1075 Saint Alphonsus speaks here only of the two essential or principal points. "To satisfy the obligation of hearing Mass," he elsewhere says, "two things are necessary—an intention and attention. It is certain that those attending Mass offer the Holy Sacrifice with the priest. Think, therefore, of the great action which you perform. Meditate on the Passion of Jesus Christ, the Last Things, etc. If you prefer, read some spiritual book, or recite either the Office of the Blessed Virgin, or the Rosary, or other prayers. But at least pay attention to what the priest does." (Instr. on the Commandments, chap. 3.—ED.)

1219 The circumstance to which St. Alphonsus here refers is thus related by him in his sermon for Septuagesima Sunday: "St. Philip Neri, speaking, one day, to a young man named Francis Zazzera, who expected to make his fortune in the world by his talents, said: Be of good heart, my son; you may make a great fortune, you may become an eminent lawyer, you may then be made a prelate, then perhaps a cardinal, and then, who knows, perhaps even Pope. And then? and then? Go, continued the Saint, and reflect upon these two words. The young man went his way, and after having meditated on the two words and then? and then? abandoned all his worldly prospects, and gave himself entirely to God. Leaving the world, he entered into the same congregation that St. Philip had founded, and then he died in the odour of sanctity."

1352 This little work was published in 1773, with the "Considerations on the Passion." The saintly author wrote on the 8th of September, 1773, in one of his spiritual letters: "Here are two little works, one of which may aid you to meditate on the Passion; I use it myself every day. . . . I also read every day something of the other little work, entitled Pious Reflections, etc. 1 wish you to do the same; for I wrote it specially for those souls that desire to give themselves up entirely to God." 1661 The little treatises that compose this third part were written and published by St. Alphonsus at different times, without intending to unite them one day in a whole work. We, however, perceive that they naturally adapt themselves to one another, and are intimately connected with one another as the members of the same body. In this combination we have not imitated the order that is observed in the first two parts, because these little works are not simply meditations or detached reflections, but treatises which seem to us to require a more systematic order. We have, therefore, arranged them according to the ordinary plan of amoral discourse; namely, the first treatise proposes the subject, that is, divine love, which constitutes our whole perfection, and our whole happiness on earth as well as in heaven, and it points out summarily the means thereto. The following four treatises confirm and develop the principal means of acquiring divine love. The sixth treatise, which discourses on Interior Trials, teaches us how to surmount particular difficulties, and even to profit by obstacles in order to raise ourselves to God. Finally, the last two present to us a glowing peroration and a practical conclusion. ED.

1774 This is a golden treatise that seems rather to have been inspired from Heaven than to have emanated from the human mind. The Saint himself read it again and again; he constantly practised the wise maxims that it contains, always endeavoured to inculcate its practice on others, and was accustomed to say, "The saints became saints because they always remained united with the will of God." After his eyesight had begun to fail him, he took care to have his little treatise read to him. ED.

Præterea, licet ille qui est in peccato, non habeat hoc in propria potestate, quod omnino vitet peccatum, habet tamen potestatem nunc vitare hoc vel illud peccatum, ut dictum est; unde, quodcumque committit, voluntarie committit, et ita non immerito sibi imputatur ad culpam."—Contra Gent.1. 3, c. 160.

2644 Jansenius De grat. Christi, lib. iii. c. 13, circa finem, p. 139, "Delectatio relativè victrix." It is the distinct doctrine of the Jansenists that as a material atom within the influence of two opposite attractions, by inevitable necessity obeys that which is most powerful, so is it with the human will. At each waking moment, they say, a man is attracted either by heavenly or earthly delight, or by both. If the first, he necessarily loves God; if the second, he necessarily sins; if the third, he necessarily obeys the "delectatio relativè victrix," that one of the two delights which is intrinsically the most intense. The liberty requisite for merit or demerit, according to Jansenius' well-known proposition, consists not in any real power of choice, or freedom from necessity, but wholly in exemption from external violence.—ED.

2645 "Hallucinatio est, qua putant semper adesse homini gratiam ut petat."—De Gr. Chr.1. 3, c. 13.

2646 "Cum ergo plurimi, vel non petant gratiam illam qua possint præcepta facere, vel non ita petant ut necessarium est, nec omnibus gratiam vel ferventer petendi vel omnino petendi Deus largiatur, apertissimum est fidelibus multis deesse illam sufficientem gratiam, et consequenter illam perpetuam, quam quidam prædicant, faciendi præcepti potestatem."

2647 For the benefit of the reader we here subjoin the five propositions:

1. Some commandments of God are impossible to just men who wish to fulfil them, and who, for this purpose, make efforts according to the strength that they at present possess; and the grace that would render them possible is wanting to them.

2. In the state of fallen nature one never resists interior grace.

3. To merit or demerit in the state of fallen nature, there is not required in man freedom from interior necessity (libertas a necessitate), but it is sufficient to have freedom from exterior compulsion (libertas a coactione).

4. The Semi-Pelagians admitted the necessity of an interior preventing grace for every act, even for the beginning of faith; they were heretics in that they maintained that the will of man can submit to this grace, or resist it.

5. It is a Semi-Pelagian error to say that Jesus Christ died or shed his blood for all men without exception.

These five propositions were condemned by Innocent X. in 1653. ED.

2651 "Quod amplius delectat, secundum id operemur necesse est."—In Gal. n. 49.

2655 "Vigente enim delectatione carnali, impossibile est ut virtutis consideratio prævaleat."—De Gr. Chr.1. 4, c. 6–9.

2660 "Nec tamen, cum vult, potest, sed cum fuerit, adhibita curatione, sanatus."—De Perf. just. c. 3, rat. 5.

2662 "Profertur primus effectus legis dare cognitionem peccati."—L. 1, c. 7.

2663 "Peccatum non cognovi nisi per legem."—Rom. 7:7.

2665 "Qua quis potest facere (peccatum), et ab eo, saltern aliud perpetrando, abstinere."—De St. nat. laps.1. 4, c. 21.

2673 "Stare meritum posse cum agendi necessitate."

2691 "Pondus meum, amor meus."—Conf.1. 13, c. 9.

2693 "Quid est trahi voluptate? 'Delectare in Domino, et dabit tibi petitiones cordis tui.' "—Ps. 36:4.

2704 "A fructibus eorum cognoscetis eos."

2706 "Liberum in hominibus esse arbitrium, utrique dicimus; liberum autem esse quemquam ad agendum bonum sine adjutorio Dei, . . . vos dicitis; hinc estis Pelagiani."—De Nupt. et Conc.1. 2, c. 3.

2709 "Neque imperaret hoc Deus ut faceremus, si impossibile judicaret ut hoc ab homine fieret."—In Ps. 56.

2714 "Neminem habere in potestate quid ei veniat in mentem."

2724 "Nullus actus excedit proportionem principii activi. Et ideo videmus in rebus naturalibus quod nulla res potest perficere effectum per suam operationem qui excedat virtutem activam, sed solum potest producere per operationem suam effectum suæ virtuti proportionatum."—1. 2. q. 109, a. 5.

2725 "Nobis enim sufficit quod hæc sola nobis Veritas concedatur, nimirum quoties gratiæ Dei consentimus, id oriri semper ex eo quod rectus amor, quem Deus nobis inspirat, viribus superior est p erverso amori, et, quia viribus superior est, idcirco eum certissime superare."—Collat. 4, c. 30.

2729 "Gratia sufficiens dat posse proximum et expeditum in ratione potentiæ."—De Gr. q. 2, d. 4, § 2.

2730 Gotti t. ii. tr. vi. de Grat. q. 2, dub. 4, n. 4, p. 286. "In sensu composito," "in sensu diviso." The meaning of these phrases will best be shown by illustrations. I have full moral power to avoid all venial sins "in sensu diviso,"—that is, I can avoid each one of them; there is no one which I cannot avoid,—but not "in sensu composito," for I have not moral power to avoid all venial sins collectively.—ED.

2748 "Deus non deficit ab agendo quod est necessarium ad salutem."—P. 1, q 49. a. 2.

2751 "Omnibus ea placuere sufficientia auxilia, vere sufficientia, quibus assentitur quandoque voluntas, quandoque non."—Cons. sch. p. 2, ad fin.

2755 Facienti quod in se est, Deus non denegat gratiam.

2757 "Aliquis potest bene agere, et aliquando bene agit."

2769 "Hæc autem auxilia, quæ omnibus dantur, a plerisque inefficacia vocantur, quia non semper habent suum effectum, sed plerumque a peccatoribus frustrantur."—De Justif.1. 13, c. 13.

2771 "Auxilium sufficiens ad salutem, pro loco et tempore, mediate vel immediate omnibus datur . . . Dicimus: Mediate vel immediate;—quoniam, iis qui usu rationis utuntur, immitti credimus a Deo sanctas inspirationes, ac per hoc immediate illos habere gratiam excitantem, cui si acquiescere velint, possint ad justificationem disponi et ad salutem aliquando pertingere."—*De Gr. et Lib. 2872 It may be of benefit to the reader to sum up here in a few simple words the teaching of St. Alphonsus about actual grace and about prayer. His teaching seems to us to dissipate all the doubts and difficulties that we meet with in the different systems.

In what God requires of us there are easy things that we can do with the ordinary grace common to all men—the grace really sufficient for acting, without the need of special help. But as soon as a soul wishes to correspond to the first grace that invites it to do the good by enlightening its intellect and fortifying its will, the Holy Ghost does not fail to unite himself to it and to aid it. Now, among the easy things that require no other help than the common grace given to all men is necessarily Prayer, by means of which we certainly obtain all the graces of which we stand in need in every state in which we may find ourselves. There are also difficult things which we cannot do without a special grace that is not common to all, but surely granted to every one that asks for it as he should by means of the common grace which is never wanting to any one.

This is conformable to the celebrated saying of St. Augustine, adopted and sanctioned by the Council of Trent: "Deus impossibilia non jubet, sed jubendo monet, et facere quod possis, et petere quod non possis; et adjuvat ut possis" (pages 30, 214). "God does not command impossible things: but by commanding, admonishes you both to do what you can, and to pray for what you cannot do; and he helps you, so that you may be able." God, who is just, in imposing his law, joins to it the necessary grace—light and force—that admonishes the conscience and furnishes the means: jubendo monet. We must therefore admit a first grace given to all men:—a grace that makes them capable of doing easy things: Facere quod possis. and, consequently, to think of praying and to wish to pray. Now, as soon as we wish to pray, we are already united with God, we have already begun to ask and to obtain: Petere quod non possis, et adjuvat ut possis. In this all is contained.—ED.

2876 We have made up this treatise from different extracts; the greatest part is taken from the True Spouse of Christ, Chapter XV., and the rest from other works that are indicated. The whole offers a complete exposition of the teaching of St. Alphonsus on mental prayer, and fills a very important gap that we could not leave in the methodical plan that we have followed; for mental prayer is unquestionably one of the greatest means of salvation and of perfection. To this treatise we add the Spiritual Retreat, which is but an extraordinary exercise of prayer.—ED

It may be useful to mention here what the author himself wrote to his religious in a circular dated February 26, 1771: "I recommend that, for the most part, the meditations should be taken from my books, The Preparation for Death, Meditations on the Passion, Darts of Fire,—the meditations from Advent to the octave of the Epiphany. I say this, not in order to put forward my own poor books, but because these meditations are made up of devout affections, and, what is of more importance, are full of holy prayers, of which I do not find many in other books; hence I make the request that the second part of the Meditations, consisting of affections and prayers, be always read."

Let us remark that St. Alphonsus renders the practice of meditation extremely simple, clear, easy, and not less profitable. Thanks to the method that he teaches, this exercise, which is indispensable to every one that wishes to sanctify himself, is, in fact, adapted to the comprehension of all. The Saint wishes that every one should learn how to meditate; he earnestly recommends that special instructions should be given to the people for this purpose; and that every day mental prayer should be made in the church, in common for persons in every condition of life, and particularly for those who do not know how to read. He moreover explains the method that should be followed in its exercise, that it may produce lasting fruits. (See Missions, ch. 7–9.)

Pope Benedict XIV. grants an indulgence of seven years and seven times forty days, every time, to all those who, in a church or elsewhere, either in public or in private, shall teach the manner of making mental prayer, as well as to those who attend such instruction, provided that each time, being truly penitent, they confess their sins and receive Holy Communion. To those who shall teach assiduously the way to make mental prayer, as well as to those who shall, with the same assiduity, learn how to make it, the same Pope grants a plenary indulgence once a month, on any day, when, being truly penitent, after confession and Communion, they shall pray for peace and union among Christian princes, for the extirpation of heresy, and for the triumph of the Church. These indulgences are applicable to the souls in Purgatory.—ED.

3072 "Quos prædestinavit, hos et vocavit; et quos vocavit, hos et justificavit; quos autem justificavit, illos et glorificavit."—Rom. 8:30.

3073 In another work (Volume XIII.) the holy Author expresses himself in these words: "God wills that all men should be saved, but not in the same way. As in heaven he has distinguished different degrees of glory, so on earth he has established different states of life, as so many different ways of gaining heaven" (Ch. 2 § 2). The choice is not arbitrary: "To enter into any state of life, a divine vocation is necessary; for without such a vocation it is, if not impossible, at least most difficult to fulfil the obligations of our state, and obtain salvation" (Ch. 10). The reason of this is evident; for it is God who in the order of his Providence assigns to each one of us his state of life and afterwards provides us with the graces and the help suitable to the state to which he calls us. We ought to be persuaded and ought never to forget that from all eternity God thinks with love of each one of us, just as a good father thinks of his only son.—ED.

3075 "Ad Cain et ad munera ejus non respexit."—Gen. 4:5.

3076 "Væ, filii desertores, dicit Dominus, ut faceretis consilium, et non ex me; et ordiremini telam, et non per spiritum meum."—Isa. 30:1.

3077 From this it follows that the great and only affair which ought to preoccupy the minds of young persons of both sexes is to know the designs of God relatively to the state of life that they are to embrace, and to obtain from him the strength to conform to it. The means to adopt in order to be successful in this affair are indicated in an appendix to this treatise.

But we should know that God does not always call one all at once and suddenly to the most perfect state. Some he calls sooner, others later. There are some who are raised to it gradually, others who are led to it by a circuitous road, more or less long. Sometimes when we correspond well to a first vocation God grants us a better one; and occasionally our Lord is satisfied with making us understand the advantages of this or that vocation, in order that by esteeming it we may desire it, and by desiring it we may endeavor to obtain it by prayer and good works. We must conform to the will of God, and be united with it as well during life as at death.—ED.

3088 "Tunc invocabunt me, et non exaudiam; mane consurgent, et non invenient me. Eo quod exosam habuerint disciplinam, . . . nec acquieverint consilio meo, et detraxerint universæ correptioni meæ."—Ibid. 1:28–30.

3089 With these last words God reprimands those who set but little value on vocation, and who pretend that one can save one's soul indifferently in every state of life. (Theol. mor.1. 4, n. 78.)

3097 "Festina, quæso te, et hærentis in salo naviculæ funem magis præcide, quam solve."—Ad Paulin. de St. Scr.

3098 We must here call to mind what the Author says in the Christian Rule of Life, chap. i.: "You should choose your director; consult him on all more important matters; and obey him in everything. He who obeys his confessor need not fear to go astray: He that heareth you, heareth Me (Luke, 10:16). The voice of the confessor is the voice of God." We should, therefore, consult at least the confessor, who may delay giving an opinion when he thinks fit to do so on account of the importance of the decision he has to render.

The following are, according to St. Alphonsus, the three principal signs of a true vocation to the religious state: "1. We should have a good end in view, such as to remove from the dangers of the world, the better to assure ourselves of salvation, and to become more closely united with God. 2. We should not be subject to any positive impediment, such as the want of health, or of talent, or parents who are necessitous ("in necessitate gravi"—Theol mor.1. 4. n. 66)—matters that should be submitted to the judgment of the Superiors, towards whom we should be frank in telling the truth. 3. We should be admitted by the Superiors of the Institute. (Counsels to Novices.)"

Moreover, in the Church there are different religious Institutes, different kinds of perfection. It is not enough to know that one is called to the religious state; one must also examine for what Institute, for what Community the Lord has destined us, and one must follow in every point the impulse of grace. (See Homo apost. tr. ult. n. 39.) ED.

3107 "Audi, filia, et vide, et inclina aurem tuam; et obliviscere populum tuum, et domum patris tui."—Ps. 44:11.

3109 "Nemo mittens manum ad aratrum, et respiciens retro, aptus est regno Dei."—Luke, 9:61.

3111 "Ab hoc consilio, primo quidem, amovendi sunt carnis propinqui; dicitur enim: "Causam tuam tracta cum amico tuo.' Propinqui autem carnis, in hoc negotio, amici non sunt, sed inimici, juxta sententiam Domini: 'Inimici hominis, domestici ejus.' "

3112 The grace of a religious vocation is not only a signal favor for him who receives it, but is also a great blessing for the whole family. Christian parents should wish it for their children as the most precious good, by giving thanks to God if he deigns to grant it, and should hasten to offer him with their whole heart the happy sacrifice that he requires of them. What may they not expect from Him who rewards so liberally the least action that we perform out of love for Him? On the other hand, to oppose a vocation is to oppose God. What would be the consequence of such an attempt?

Happily, we see parents who, giving the good example of an entire submission to God's will, have the wisdom to anticipate their children with the intention not to oppose their happiness and to leave them every liberty in reference to their vocation. Such parents do not run the risk of being deceived, and they acquire, moreover, great merit before the Lord.

St. Alphonsus, however, does not wish that young men should act thoughtlessly in a matter as important as it is delicate. He requires of them that they at least should consult a prudent director who will take care to weigh maturely before God all the circumstances, and to examine, among other things, whether the parents would not have some serious reason to allege; for instance, the grave necessity in which they found themselves, etc. We thus remove all danger of taking a rash step. (See note, page 388.)—ED.

3113 "I say 'in which reigns exact observance;' for it would be, perhaps, better to remain in the world than to enter a religious Institute in which relaxation has been introduced." We see that this remark is made by the author himself; he also says elsewhere, "Si institutum relaxatum est, melius erit alicui ordinarie loquendi, quod in sæculo remaneat." 3214 Although in this consideration, and in some other passages, St. Alphonsus may have had specially in view the Congregation of missionaries which he founded, yet the subject refers to all religious of both sexes, and to all persons who serve God. All are called to exercise directly or indirectly this charitable apostolate; every one according to his talent or his means, whether by a generous co-operation in the works that have for their object the defence of faith or the conversion of sinners, or by prayer and the other practices of piety. (See page 67.) All can share in the magnificent reward that the Lord reserves for his evangelical laborers (Matt. 10:40 et seq.; James 5:20).

3245 The holy author supposes in this case, as well as in the preceding answer, that the person to whom this advice is addressed is called to be a religious, or has at least the beginning of a vocation to the religious state, but the world keeps her back, and she hesitates. This supposition does not, however, hold good as regards the foregoing letter that treats of the spiritual exercises.—ED.

3928 This happy young man is no other than St. Edmund, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, as we may see in his life by Surius, November 16

We may here add a more recent example, which we read in the Life of the Venerable Brother Gerar d Majella, of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, by Father Tannoia. Animated with fervent piety already in his infancy, he loved to visit a church in which was honored the mother of God holding the Infant Jesus in her arms. While Gerard was one day entering the church the divine Infant came to meet him and offered him a piece of white bread—a symbol of the gift that he was soon to give him in the most adorable sacrament of the Eucharist. Gerard, attracted by the sweet charms of the Infant Saviour, went often to the same church, and Jesus very frequency be-stowed upon him the same favor.

Later on he entered the service of a master who was extremely harsh and who omitted no opportunity to try Gerard’s heroic patience. A key was one day accidentally dr opped into a well. Fore-seeing the trouble and the irritation that this accident would cause his master, and the sins that would be the result, Gerard, full of confidence, took a small statue of the Infant Jesus, lowered it into the well by means of a cord, and said, “You must see to it that my master does not become impatient.” When he had drawn up the statue in the presence of a large number of people, it was holding the key in its hands.—ED

4197 We think that it will be pleasing to St. Alphonsus, as well as to his pious readers, to add here, as an appendix, the list of indulgences with which the Sovereign Pontiffs have enriched the devotion to the Infant Jesus, and which we copy from the Raccolta. All these indul gences are applicable to the souls in purgatory.—ED.

4198 Saint Alphonsus set a high value on this little treatise. He recommends it in several places of his works, and we read in one of his spiritual letters (December 18, 1767) that he himself used it nearly every day. In it is to be found the expression of those sentiments with which the saintly author mostly loved to nourish himself, and by which he sanctified his soul. In this treatise are chiefly repeated, under every form, the most fervent acts of contrition and of love. "They are irresistible darts that pierce the hardest hearts, and in flame divine love in the coldest souls." These pious reflections may be especially used when we are in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament, in our Visits, before and after Holy Communion, during Holy Mass and other divine services, or when we meditate on the Passion of our Lord. This treatise, entitled Darts of Fire, was published by the holy author in 1767.—ED.

4895 In this introduction, the saintly author informs us that when he wrote this treatise he was seventy-seven years of age. This was thirteen years after he had written the Simple Exposition of the Passion. The considerations he wrote less for the use of others than for his own spiritual advantage, being desirous of preparing himself well for death. He sent the little work to a pious person, with a letter dated September 8, 1773, in which he says: “You may use this little book in your prayers when you meditate on the Passion. I am using it myself every day. I desire that you should not allow a day to pass without recalling to your mind, with the aid of this or another book, something of the Passion. The Passion was for the saints a continual subject of meditation.”—ED.

5622 At the end, the Our Father, the Hail Mary, and the Glory be to the Father may be said to the intention of the Sovereign Pontiff.

5623 This is, however, not a mere abridgment that St. Alphonsus gives us. As was usual with him, he appropriated the subject and treated it after his own manner by confining himself to quoting on some points the opinion of the French author. What he ascribes to the latter is found, nearly word for word, in the book entitled "L'Idée du Sacerdoce et du Sacrifice de Jésus-Christ, par le R. P. De Condren, etc. Par un Prêtre de l'Oratoire." We doubt, however, whether this excellent work is that which our Saint had before him; for it appears to us that such a work cannot be called anonymous, though the learned Oratorian who published it in 1677 gives in the title-page only his title, and the initials of his name in his dedication, by signing himself P. Q. (This is Father Pasquier Quesnel, who later on became unfortunately so famous.) This doubt is confirmed by the remark that we add further on, page 26, and is changed almost into certainty in view of a passage that we read on page 36, and that we have not seen in the aforesaid work. We therefore believe that there exists a more recent work in which "L'Idée" of Father De Condren is reproduced in an incomplete manner and without the name of the author. —ED.

5644 It seems to us that the two explanations which we have just read—the explanation of the anonymous author and that of St. Alphonsus—about the consummation or the last two parts of the Sacrifice of Jesus Christ can be and should be admitted, should not exclude each other, but should be united. It was necessary that this great sacrifice, the only real sacrifice worthy of God, should be consummated in heaven and on earth at the same time, to unite to God the body of Jesus Christ entirely; that is, the Church triumphant and the Church militant: in heaven, by the glorious union of Jesus Christ, of the Blessed Virgin, of the angels, of the saints with God, and among themselves in the bosom of God in which the sacrifice is perfect and eternal: on earth, by Holy Mass and Communion, in which all the faithful partake of the same victim under the Eucharistic veil. The body of the Redeemer, immolated on the Cross, had, therefore, to be transformed in a twofold manner; namely, by the resurrection, for the consummation of the sacrifice in heavenly glory; by the Eucharist, for the consummation of the sacrifice in earthly combats. This twofold consummation of the true sacrifice was typified in the ceremonies of the Old Law: the burning of the victim represented heavenly Communion, and the eating of it represented earthly Communion. But in heaven, as in Holy Mass, we have not only consummation, but we have all the parts of the Sacrifice of the Cross and of the sacrifices of the Old Law. Hence, three kinds of sacrifices, or three degrees, are to be distinguished. In the Old Law there were figures without the reality; in the New Law we have the reality under the figures or appearances; in glory we have the reality exposed and unveiled. Such is, briefly, the thought of Père De Coudren, wisely developed by him who published it. Such is, also, without doubt, the thought of St. Alphonsus; for otherwise we should not understand what he says on page 22, where he explains the text taken from Daniel.—ED.

We ask, in the one as in the other, what is each day necessary for the subsistence of the body and of the soul; but we chiefly ask for spiritual nourishment, and, above everything else, for the Holy Eucharist, which is pre-eminently and beyond comparison called the bread of life and the true bread of the children of God: Panis vitæ, vere Panis filiorum.—ED.

5702 We find this exercise, with that which is mentioned at the end of the Novena to the Holy Ghost, in an old edition of the Reflections and Affections on the Passion (Operette spir., p. 2. Napoli, 1769). The act which concludes it—the Offering of the Mass—shows that it here finds a suitable place in connection with the Holy Sacrifice, as it does elsewhere in connection with Holy Communion.—There are other shorter Acts for Confession in the Christian's Rule of Life, chap. 2. § 3. 5812 His Holiness, Pius IX., by an autograph rescript, September 7, 1854, confirmed August 8 and September 23, 1859, attached to each of the two prayers of St. Alphonsus, beginning with the words, My Lord Jesus Christ,—Most Holy Immaculate Virgin, —an indulgence of three hundred days each time that one recites with, at least contrite heart, either the first before the Blessed Sacrament, or the second before an image of the Blessed Virgin. His Holiness granted, besides, a plenary indulgence, once a month, to persons who during this time recite every day both those prayers in the manner indicated, provided they confess and communicate and pray for some time to the intention of the Sovereign Pontiff.—ED.

5817 We have two kinds of Visits to the Blessed Virgin, one of which is found in several editions published at Naples, and the other in those editions that have appeared elsewhere. Both kinds, however, were without doubt written by St. Alphonsus. This is the reason why we publish them in his complete works. It may, perhaps, be asked why two kinds of Visits have been published, and which of the two was published first? To this no positive answer can be given, though we may venture on a conjecture. The Visits to the Blessed Sacrament appeared about the year 1745, with those Visits to the Blessed Virgin that we have put in the first place, and that were soon spread all over Europe. About five years after this publication, in 1750, the work called Glories of Mary was published, and excited comment on the part of some critics. An anonymous writer dared to reproach St. Alphonsus with having exaggerated certain prerogatives attributed to the Mother of God; but the saint at once replied to this attack and triumphantly repelled it. It is very probable that St. Alphonsus then replaced the first twenty two Visits that he had composed in honor of the Blessed Virgin by prayers drawn from different authors of great celebrity—prayers that had already been inserted in his book, the Glories of Mary, "to show the high idea that the saints had of the power and mercy of the Mother of God." The nine other Visits, joined to these prayers, appear to have been chosen with some modifications in the text which we regard as the first published. But this change was made only in the Naples editions; everywhere else the first prevailing text, or translations therefrom, have continued to be printed, with the exception of the first French translation which was made in 1773, from the fifteenth Naples edition.—ED.

6067 The reader is aware that the desire of St. Alphonsus was realized a few years afterwards, and even during his lifetime. In 1765 the permission to celebrate the feast of the Sacred Heart by an Office and a Proper Mass on the Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi was granted to several churches by Clement XIII.; nearly all the dioceses of the Catholic world asked and successively obtained the same permission; and Pope Pius IX. by a decree of August 23, 1856, in answer to a request of the bishops of France, rendered this feast obligatory for the universal Church. Moreover, by another decree, dated May 8, 1873, His Holiness vouchsafed to grant to persons who every day during the month of June offer special prayers and perform some pious acts in honor of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, either in public or in private, an indulgence of seven years for each of those days, and besides, a plenary indulgence on any day of the month, provided that, being truly penitent, after confession and Communion, they shall visit some church or public oratory and pray there devoutly, for some time, for the intention of His Holiness. These indulgences are applicable to the souls in purgatory.—ED.

6706 Qui elucidant me, vitam eternam habebunt. Eccli. 24:31.

6737 Tu es regina misericordiæ, et ego miserrimus peccator, subditorum maximus. Rege nos ergo, o regina misericordiæ. In Salv. Reg,

6745 Pater futuri sæculi, princeps pacis. Isa. 9:6.

6747 Peperit filium suum primogenitum. Luc. cap. 2:7.

6749 Venter tuus sicut acervus tritici, vallatus liliis. Cant. 7:2.

6850 Ne timeas Maria, invenisti gratiam. Luc. 1:30.

6851 Ave gratia plena, Dominus tecum.

6853 Cupientes invenire gratiam quæramus inventricem gratiæ, quæ, quia semper invenit frustrari non poterit. De Laud. V.1. 2.

6854 Ego murus et ubera mea sicut turris. Cant. 8:10.

6857 Concede, misericors Deus, fragilitati nostræ præsidium; ut qui sanctæ Dei Genitricis memoriam agimus, intercessionis ejus auxilio a nostris iniquitatibus resurgamus.

6858 Tu es spes unica peccatorum, quia, per te speramus veniam omnium delictorum. Serm. 18, de Sanctis.

6859 Per hanc peccatorum veniam consequimur.

6861 Quæ est ista, quæ progreditur quasi aurora consurgens? Cant. 6:9.

6867 In te peccatores veniam, justi gratiam inveniunt in eternum. Serm. de Nat. B. V.

facere tibi bonum, et largiri gratiam, quam tu acciperi concupiscas. Serm. 5, de N. M.

6869 Fidejussio divinarum reconciliationum, quæ dato pignore fit.

7069 Per diem in columna nubis, et per noctem in columna ignis. Exod. 13:21.

7078 Satan fugit, infernus contremiscit, cum dico Ave Maria.

7085 Gloria filiorum Patres eorum. Prov. 17:6.

7086 Non est dubium, quicquid in laudibus matris profermius, ad filium pertinere. Hom. 4, Sup. Miss.

7088 Maria fidelissima mediatrix nostræ salutis.

7092 Sic est voluntas ejus, qui totum nos habere voluit per Mariam.

7096 In me omnis gratia vitæ et veritatis.

7097 Qui me invenerit, inveniet vitam, et hauriet salutem a Domino.

7099 Ejus magnalia firmiter credere. Laud. Virg.

7100 Felix namque es, sacra Virgo Maria, et omni laude dignissima.

7105 Per eam de cœlis exivit quidquid gratiæ venit in mundum. P. 4, tit. 15, c. 20.

7107 Datum est Mariæ, ut per illam acciperes quicquid haberes. Serm. 3, in Virg. Nat.

7108 Nullus potest cœlum, intrare, nisi per Mariam transeat tamquam per portam.

7110 Per Virginem a capite Christi vitales gratiæ in ejus corpus mysticum transfunduntur. Serm. 61, de Nat. Virg. c. 8.

7113 Crasset. Div. della Verg.

7114 Fœmina circumdabit virum. Jerem. 31:22.

7200 Quicquid tu Virgo velis, nequaquam fieri non poterit. De Exc. Virg. c. 12.

7206 Joan. 2:7.

7207 Et licet ita responderit, maternis tamen precibus obtemperavit.

7209 Quo matrem honoraret, prævenit tempus miraculi faciendi.

7211 Quæ habitas in hortis, amici auscultant, fac me audire vecem tuam. Cant. 8:13.

7219 Domina benedicta, quid est quod non poteris? Quod enim vis, hoc factum est. L. 4, Rev. c. 74.

7220 Quod Deus imperio, tu prece Virgo potes.

7222 Filius quasi exsolveus debitum, implet petitiones tuas. Or. de Ex. Mar.

7228 Mirac. di Maria, Mir. 47.

7229 Loquere, Domina, quia audit filius tuus et quæcumque petieris, impertrabis.

7230 Maria diligit diligentes se; imo sibi servientibus servit. Ipsa benedicto filio suo irato potentissime reconciliat servos et amatores suos. Præf. in Cant.

7234 Grande privilegium Mariæ, quod apud filium sit potentissima. In Spec. lect. 6, 7.

7235 Sed quid tanta Mariæ potentia prodesset nobis; si ipsa nihii curaret de nobis?

7238 Quis ita nos defendit in nostris afflictionibus. Quis pugnat pre peccatoribus?

7239 Propterea patrotinum tuum majus est quam apprehendi possit.

7246 Unam te ac solam pro nobis in cœlo fatemur esse sollicitam. Ap. in Spec. lect. 6.

7248 Salve jus dirimens lites. Ap. Pep. Lez. to. 5.

7249 Benedicta tu, quæ prohibuisti me hodie, ne ulciscerer me manu mea. C. xxx.

7251 Quid ad Mariam accedere trepidet humana fragilitas? Nihii susterum in ea, nihil terribile, tota suavis est.

7524 Quæ est ista, quæ ascendit per desertum, sicut virgula fumi? O 3:6.

7526 Quæ est ista, quæ ascendit de deserto deliciis affluens? 8:5.

7543 Omnes dæmones verentur hoc nomen, et timent, qui audientes hoc nomen Mariæ, statim relinquunt animam de unguibus, quibus tenebant eam. Rev.1. 2, c. 19.

7548 Luc. 1:27.

7553 Tanta enim est in me dulcedo verborum tuorum, quod negare non valeo, quod tu petis.

7554 Nomen Mariæ; est reseratorium portæ cœli. In Deprec ad Virg.

7558 Beatus vir qui dillgit nomen tuum, Maria!

7595 Talis enim decebat, ut nobis esset pontifex sanctus, innocens, impollutus segregatus a peccatoribus, etc. Heb. 7:26.

7601 Gloria enim hominis ex honore patris sui, et dedecus filii pater sine honore. Eccli. 3:13.

7605 Tu sola inventa est digna, ut in tua virginali aula Rex Regum primam sibi mansionem eligeret. In Depr. ad Virg.

7607 B. Virgo cujus viscera meruerunt portare Christum Dominum. Resp. 1, Noct. 2, in Nat. Mar.

7610 Quæ autem excellentia, quæ perfectio decuit eam ut esset mater Dei. Serm. 3, Nat. Virg.

7615 Intra viscera, quæ citra ullam sui dedecoris notam creaverat, habitavit. Or. de Nat. Dom.

7622 Dei filius in ipsa habitabit, non solum in anima, sed etiam in utero. 3, p. q. 27, a. 4.

7624 Quis unquam audivit architectum, qui sibi domum ædificavit, ejus occupationem et possessionem primo suo inimico cessisse. In Conc. Eph.n. 6.

7626 Sicut honorem matris præcipit ita inhonorationem damnat. Serm. de Ass. B. Virg.

7629 Duplex est redimendi modus, unus redimendo lapsum, alter redimendo non lapsum, ne cadat.

8664 Is. lix. 1.

8665 No, certainly, "the hand of the Lord hath not been shortened;" we see this at all times displaying itself with a new lustre. At the time when St. Alphonsus wrote this sketch, more than a century ago, one of the most terrible trials to which the Church had to submit began by the suppression of the Jesuits, and ended in the French Revolution. The altar and the throne were overturned; the last trace of them was to be effaced; the blood of the martyrs flowed in torrents; the Sovereign Pontiff, despoiled of his States, was dragged into exile, where he died. The Church appeared annihilated in the eyes of her enemies, when she rose again with Pius VII., who, chosen miraculously at Venice, proceeded without hindrance to Rome and sat triumphantly on his throne in sight of an astonished world. His invincible patience, resting only on God, overcame all the artifices and all the violence of a tyrant who was then all-powerful, of whom God made an illustrious example of his justice and mercy. At the present day we see that three things are lying in the abyss opened by impiety to engulf religion. These three things are Josephism, Gallicanism, and Jansenism. Not only is divine worship re-established in France, but this fertile land, notwithstanding the efforts of hell, produces a multitude of new institutions, fruits of the noblest zeal, such as the admirable work of the Propagation of the Faith. The same religious movement signalizes itself in other parts of Europe by many remarkable conversions, notably in Germany, Sweden, and England. The Catholic missions make progress nearly everywhere—in Africa, Asia, America, and Australia, and as far as the innumerable islands of Oceanica, where horrible cannibals become exemplary Christians. Corea counts more than ten thousand followers of Christ and one hundred and forty martyrs before it has even seen a priest; something nearly similar took place among the Indians of the Rocky Mountains in northern Oregon. The pontificate of Pius IX., troubled as was that of Pius VII., is not less fertile in wonders of every kind; thus, among other things, at the moment of peril, a devoted band of young men came from different Catholic countries, closed around the Vicar of Jesus Christ, and did not hesitate to shed their blood in defence of the rights of the Holy See; and when the Holy Father was deprived of necessary resources there was established the Peter's pence, which extended from Belgium to all other countries, to assist in overcoming falsehood, hypocrisy, and brutal force that had conspired against the Church. The Church of God on earth is always militant; but each of her combats furnishes a new proof of the truth of the infallible words: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against her" (Matt. xvi. 18).—ED.

8680 In Part II. we shall see several other tortures invented by the refined cruelty of the Japanese.—ED.

8681 This holds good only of Part I.; in Part II. the author has followed a chronological order, but we may everywhere ee that he has taken care to vary the subjects, according to the condition of persons, of their country, ol their manner of death; for instance, a distinguished old man, the Bishop of Antioch, is transported to Rome to be devoured by beasts; now a young woman with her child is beheaded in Asia Minor; then a generous deacon undergoes various tortures in Spain; etc.—Ed.

8686 We think it our duty to rectify several passages of this narration, in which the author has confused two holy martyrs of the same name and of the same period, but not of the same place. She whose victory St. Basil describes in his homilies was of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, when she was denounced as a Christian by the spoliation of her property, and then condemned to be burnt alive, because she had steadfastly refused to offer incense to the idols, as we read in the martyrology, July 30. This was at the beginning of the persecution of Diocletian in 303. She was courageous enough to place herself at once on the funeral pile. After the execution her body was found entire, without change; then it was interred in the vestibule of the cathedral church, where afterwards a fountain sent forth miraculous water which healed many sick persons. All these circumstances have reference to St. Julitta of Cæsarea.—As for St. Julitta of Iconium, the mother St. Cyr, the martyrology mentions her, June 16. She was recognized and arrested as a Christian on her arrival in Tharsis. After seeing her son perish in a manner so cruel and yet so consoling, she was subjected to various tortures, and terminated her triumph by being beheaded. Her body and that of her son were then cast out of the city with those of other criminals; but her two servants who had taken flight and had hidden themselves, came secretly, carried them away, and carefully buried them in the field. Later on, when peace was restored to the Church, under the great Constantine, one of them who was yet living discovered the precious deposit, which became the object of the veneration of the faithful. Dom Ruinart and the other authors cited by St. Alphonsus are in accord with these facts, the narrative of which is drawn from a letter of Theodore, Bishop of Iconium. Giry and Butler add that St. Amator, Bishop of Auxerre from 388 till 418, carried to France the relics of St. Cyr and of St. Julitta, and distributed them in several places, especially at Nevers, Toulouse, St. Amand in Flanders, etc. Churches and monasteries were consecrated in their honor, and they were venerated in the West as well as in the East.—ED.

8692 After the execution their bodies were found entire and fresh as in full health, without any trace of fire. St. Hermes, though a simple deacon, was a distinguished man. He had been first magistrate of the city of Heraclea, and had fulfilled the duties of his office with so much wisdom that he conciliated the esteem and veneration of all his fellow-citizens. After having renounced everything to devote himself to the service of the Church, he took the resolution to live only by the labor of his hands, like the great Apostle, and he had a son named Philip whom he brought up in the same principles. While the executioners were setting fire to the pile in which he was to be consumed, and perceiving one of his friends in the crowd, he called him and said: "Go, and tell my son: 'These are the last words of your dying father—words that he leaves you as the most precious marks of his affection. You are young avoid as dangerous everything that can weaken your soul; above all, avoid sloth; keep the peace with every one.' " The flames having risen prevented him from continuing. These details are given by Ruinart.—Ed.

8700 According to certain authors, St. Sabinus consummated his martyrdom December 7, 304, although the martyrology mentions him on December 30. Giry adds that the virtuous Serena also obtained the crown of the martyrs some time after, and that she is honored at Metz, January 30.—ED.

8708 A wonderful profession of faith, evidently inspired by Him who said: "You shall be brought before governors, and before kings for my sake, for a testimony to them and to the gentiles [of my divinity and of the truth of my doctrine]. But when they shall deliver you up, take no thought how or what to speak; for it shall be given you in that hour what to speak. For it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you" (Matt. x. 18). 8717 In the primitive times, in which the Church was composed only of converts, it was not unusual to see married men raised to the dignity of the priesthood and even to that of the episcopate; but these were obliged to live in perpetual continence. 8722 Or Nisibis, at present Nezib in Mesopotamia.

8724 At present Cherchell, a small village in the province of Mascara, in Algiers. The time in which St. Arcadius suffered is uncertain; according to Alban Butler it was probably in the third century.-ED.

8725 The ancient Sichem, now called Naplous.—It is in reference to the place of his birth, and not in allusion to his religious principles, that St. Epiphanius calls our saint a Samaritan, for St. Justin himself declares that he had been a Gentile previously to his conversion.

8726 The clerical character of St. Justin is by no means an uncontroverted point. The silence of the ancient authors with regard to his ordination has induced some to consider him a layman, as they think that so important a circumstance, had it taken place, could not have been omitted by early writers. Yet this, after all, is but a negative argument; and the other opinion, although founded only upon inference, seems more probable. His preaching, teaching, catechizing, etc., would proclaim him a deacon, at least; and it is hard to believe that if such a person at all entered the clerical state the Church would have failed to promote him to the priesthood. The circumstantial evidence in favor of his ordination has been sufficient to convince Tillemont and others.—ED.

8727 The deacons of the ancient Church frequently carried the Eucharist to the Christians who were in prison for the faith, or otherwise unavoidably absent; and sometimes even administered it in the assemblies of the faithful, as these words of St. Justin are frequently cited to prove. They did not, however, discharge this duty by virtue of their office, but merely by the delegated power given them by their Superiors. The circumstances of the Church, during the persecutions, rendered this discipline necessary, and an instance is recorded by Eusebius (Lib. 6, Histor. cap. xxxvi.) of even a layman having been sent with the Viaticum to a dying person. Vasquez (Disp. 219, cap. 1) shows that this practice was not contrary to the divine institution of the Eucharist.—ED.

8728 The followers of Marcion and Valentinus.—Marcion, having been excommunicated for a crime of incontinency, committed under very aggravating circumstances, professed himself a Stoic philosopher, turned heresiarch, and taught the existence of two gods, or first principles. Valentinus fell away from the faith, as Tertullian (Lib. cont. Valent, cap. 4) relates, in consequence of his pride and jealousy, because another person was preferred to him, in the election of a bishop. The errors of this heresiarch were most ridiculous: he taught the existence of an eternal and invisible God, called Bathos, who, being married to a divinity styled Ennoia, produced thirty inferior deities, whom he denominated Æônes. Pope St. Anicetus was most vigilant in protecting the faithful from the artifices of these heretics, and their errors were ably refuted by St. Irenæus, Tertullian, and others.—Ed.

8730 These were Chariton, Evelpiste, Hierax, Peon, Liberianus, and a woman named Charitana.—ED.

8732 He was born at Tharsus, of a patrician family, and had been for some time Prætor of Constantinople. After the cabal which obliged St. Gregory Nazianzen to retire from that see, he was appointed to it. Although at the time advanced in years, and not only a layman, but a catechumen, and one, moreover, whose conduct had been irregular. The circumstances that led to his appointment are rather curious, and are given at length by Fleury (Hist. tom. iv. liv. 18, num. v.). Having made a complimentary visit to Diodore, Bishop of Tharsus, this prelate was so taken with his venerable appearance, his majestic mien and the amiability and blandness of his deportment, that he represented him to Flavianus, Bishop of Antioch, as a fit person to occupy the vacant See of Constantinople. Flavianus, knowing that many eminent persons were being presented, laughed at the proposal; but wishing to please his friend, placed the name of Nectarius at the end of the list of candidates, which he presented to the Emperor Theodosius. The emperor used all his influence to have him appointed, and finally succeeded in obtaining his confirmation from the Pope.—ED.

8733 This writer attributes the fire to the divine displeasure at the saint's banishment.—Dialog, c. 20.

8734 They are mentioned in the Roman Martyrology on the 12th January.

8735 Later on his venerated relics were transported to Rome and placed in the Vatican Church, under the altar erected in his honor. As the day of his death is that on which is celebrated the feast of the Exaltation of the Cross, the Greeks keep this feast on November 13, and the Latins, January 27. His wonderful eloquence earned for him the surname of Chrysostom, or Golden Mouth, and his excellent writings the title of Doctor of the Church.—ED.

8736 This prelate, charmed with the happy disposition of his pupil, conceived for him the tenderness of a father, and gave him his name in admitting him to the sacrament of confirmation. Young Adalbert was a child of the Blessed Virgin. Being yet an infant, he was attacked by a violent illness that reduced him to extremity. His parents then carried him to the church, and placed him on St. Mary's alter, and promised to consecrate him to the service of God if he should recover his health. Their prayers were heard. (See Alban Butler and Giry.)-ED.

8737 Geysa, or Giesa the Fourth, Duke of Hungary, had been converted to the Christian faith, and baptized, together with his entire family. Shortly after his baptism, and just before the arrival of our saint, he was informed in a vision that a heavenly messenger would arrive in his dominions. St. Adalbert was therefore kindly received at his court; and we are informed by Fleury (Hist., tom. 12, liv. 58, num. vii.) that his preaching was followed by the conversion of many, and the erection of churches in various places. Geysa had contemplated the establishment of bishoprics throughout his dominions, but was told, in the vision already mentioned, that his hands had been stained with human blood, and that God had reserved the accomplishment of this great work for his son. The promise was amply fulfilled in the period of St. Stephen, first king of Hungary, who seems to have been born about the time of St. Adalbert's arrival, and was baptized by him.-ED.

8738 Or Cirta, at present Constantine, in Algiers. The province of Constantine is ancient Numidia, of which Cirta was the capital.—ED.

8739 Inscribed in the martyrology under date of April 29.

8740 St. Peter Damian (Tom. I1. in fine) explains this vision to us. The judge is evidently our Lord himself, who makes his faithful ascend by degrees to the perfection that he requires of them; then he sends them to martyrdom by giving them the strength to triumph, although he seems to disappear at the moment of the combat. St. Cyprian, who comes to the assistance of Marianus, was Bishop of Carthage, a neighboring city in Numidia, and had been martyred only a short time before, in 258; this makes us believe that our two saints belonged to his church. The meadow represents this world through which we are only passing. The high trees are the saints who look down upon us and protect us. The bowl out of which St. Cyprian was the first to drink is the chalice of the passion or martyrdom: "He shall drink of the torrent in the way"—De torrente in via bibet (Ps. cix. 7).".—ED.

8746 After the persecution there were built at Syracuse, in honor of St. Lucy, two churches, of which one was in the city where her body was buried, and the other outside of the city, in the place where she was martyred. One of her arms was afterwards taken to Constantinople, and thence to Venice. In the eighth century, the Duke of Spoleto, having made himself master of Sicily, had the relics of the saint taken away to enrich therewith the city of Corsino, in his duchy; and in 970, Thierry, Bishop of Metz, having come to Italy with the Emperor Otto I., obtained this great treasure for the church of St. Vincent at Metz, where he had it deposited in a sumptuous chapel. The second arm was given in 1042 to the abbey of Liutburg. The precious relics of the saint having fortunately escaped the sacrilegious fury of the revolutionists, repost at present in the Church of Ottange (Moselle). They have been everywhere, and are even now, venerated with the greatest devotion. (See Giry, Paris, 1860.)—ED.

8747 A celebrated monastery of Constantinople; hence the surname of Studite, given to St. Theodorus and St. Nicholas. We read in the martyrology, November 12: "St. Theodorus the Studite, who, by the combat that he sustained for the Catholic faith against the iconoclast heretics, has made himself famous in the whole Church." He was of a very distinguished family, and had for his master in spiritual life St. Plato, his uncle, Abbot of Symboleon, then of Saccudion, near Constantinople, where he succeeded him in 794. He was beaten with rods and exiled to Thessalonica by order of the Emperor Constantine VI., whose scandalous marriage he had blamed. Having been restored to his community after the sad death of this prince in 797, he assumed the direction of it, and afterwards transferred it to the monastery of Studius in order to avoid the insults of the Mussulmans, who were already making incursions as far as the gates of the city. As for St. Nicholas, we do not find him inscribed in the Roman martyrology, but the Bollandists give his Life on February 4. This Life is so intimately united with that of his illustrious master, that it is, so to speak, one and the same history. This is the reason why we have believed it to be well to place the two names at the head of the paragraph, although the original bears only the name of St. Nicholas.—ED.

8757 The Menology of Basil, quoted by Bollandus, does not mention the kind of death that St. Gordius suffered. The Menologies of the Greeks, which are also quoted by Bollandus, say that he perished by the sword: Ferro occubuit. Baronius (anno 304, n. 62) leads us to believe that his throat was cut: Jugulum ferro obtulit. St. Basil, however, speaks only of flames to which the martyr was consigned. Perhaps the holy martyr was stabbed on the funeral pile and burned afterwards as a victim immolated as a holocaust.—ED.

8758 Three sisters, virgins and martyrs, executed at Thessalonica. The first two were burnt alive on April 3, and the third on April 5, according to the martyrology. Dom Ruinart has recorded their Acts in his collection, after Baronius and Surius.—ED.

8760 Alban Butler says with greater authority that the relics translated to Constantinople seem to have been those of St. Anastasia the Elder, martyred at Sirmich (or at Rome, according to the martyrology, October 28, and our author, Chap. LVII.), under Valerian, and that the body of St. Anastasia, widow, called the Junior, was transferred to Rome and deposited in the church that still bears her name. It was in this church that the Pope in ancient times used to celebrate the second Mass of Christmas, in which a commemoration of the saint is made. The holy widow did not live a long time with her unworthy husband; she was therefore very young; and we read in her first letter to St. Chrysogonus that she had preserved her virginity. This is undoubtedly the reason why several authors give her the title of virgin. —ED.

8761 † The origin of this appellation was the following: The violent Arian Bishop, Macedonius, obtained from the Emperor Constantius an edict commanding that the churches of all those who maintained that God the Son was consubstantial with the Father should be pulled down. This intolerant measure affected the Novatians as well as the Catholics, and one of their churches in Constantinople was demolished. They, however, assembled in such numbers, and men, women, and children labored so perseveringly, that in a surprisingly short time they transferred the materials to the other side of the water, and built their church there. The Emperor Julian afterwards gave them their original site, and again they brought back their materials; and having rebuilt the church, and rendered it more magnificent than before, they called it "The Anastasia," i.e., the resuscitated. It is in this sense only that it can be styled "The Church of the Resurrection," for it was not dedicated in honor of the Resurrection of our Lord, but to the Eternal Wisdom, as the title, Sancta Sophia, implies.

8762 There was question, says Alban Butler, of the fast called the fast of the stations, which was kept on Wednesdays and Fridays; it was not broken till None, that is, about three o'clock in the afternoon, and it was then ten o'clock in the morning.—ED.

8769 This was on the occasion of the second rebuilding of her church, by Cardinal Paolo Emilio Sfrondato, to whom Rome is indebted for the present most magnificent church called "Santa Cecilia in Trastevere."

8771 There exists to the present day a tradition that St. Cecilia was confined, not in the common prison, but in her own house, perhaps out of respect to her rank. This is the more probable as she suffered under the Emperor Alexander Severus, who was very favorable to the Christians; for although, as Cardinal Orsi and Tillemont relate, several of them suffered martyrdom during his reign, this was owing to popular disturbance, or to the tyranny of the governors. It was thought necessary to record the opinion, that the saint was imprisoned in her own dwelling; as, without the knowledge of this circumstance, several of the facts stated by our holy author might appear dubious. It is only by supposing this circumstance and her having amply satisfied the avarice of the guards, that we can imagine it possible for her to have summoned St. Urban from the catacombs, and to have held such assemblies in her prison. The oven or stove in which they attempted to suffocate the saint was that which warmed the domestic baths.—ED.

8772 Among these, St. Jerome should not be forgotten, whose beautiful and concise eulogy of the saint was considered by Baronius as her most appropriate panegyric: "By the writings and the tongues of all nations, particularly in the churches, hath St. Agnes been praised, who overcame both the tenderness of her age and the cruelty of the tyrant and sanctified the honor of her chastity with the glory of martyrdom."—S. Hier. Ep. viii.

8775 The martyrdom of St. Agnes took place, according to Ruinart, about the year 304. Her virginal body was religiously deposited in 3 place belonging to her parents. The following is what is contained in the Roman Breviary in her office of January 28: "One night when the parents of the blessed Agnes were watching at her grave, she appeared to them in company with a band of virgins, and said to them: 'Father and mother, weep not for me as though I were dead: for now these virgins and I live together in Him whose love was my whole life upon earth.' Some years afterwards, Constance, the daughter of the Emperor Constantine, being sick of an incurable ulcer, betook herself to the said grave, although she was not yet a Christian, and as she lay by it and slept, she seemed to hear the voice of Agnes, saying to her: 'Constance, be of good courage; believe in Jesus Christ the Son of God, and he will make thee whole.' The princess, being healed, was baptized, along with many others of the emperor's family and household, and afterwards built over the grave of the blessed Agnes a church named in her honor."

Alban Butler or Godescard adds: "This church gives title to a Cardinal. Every year, on the feast of St. Agnes, the abbot of St. Peter's ad Vincula blesses in it, at High Mass, two lambs, which are thence carried to the Pope, by whom they are again blessed. After this they are sent to the nuns of St. Laurence's, in Panisperna, or sometimes to the Capucinesses, who make of the wool of these lambs palliums, which the Pope blesses and sends to the archbishops and bishops who occupy privileged sees. These palliums are emblems of meekness and spotless purity. St. Augustine says that the name Agnes signifies lamb in Latin, and chaste in Greek."

Dom Gueranger, in his history of St. Cecilia, chapter 31, describes the labors undertaken in 1605 to discover the relics of St. Agnes. They were found under the main altar in a marble tomb in which they had been resting for a thousand years, with the relics of St. Emerantiana, her foster-sister. The precious relics of these two virgins were at once enclosed in a silver reliquary presented by Pope Paul V.—ED.

8776 He is also styled Bishop of Ctesiphon, a city built by the Parthians, on the bank of the river Tigris, opposite to that upon which the ancient Seleucia, now Bagdad, stood. Some are of opinion that these ancient cities were separated only by the river, while others contend that they were three miles apart; Fleury makes the distance thirty. This last opinion seems improbable, as bishoprics were formerly very —small; and we frequently find Seleucia and Ctesiphon spoken of as one archbishopric. The first general council of Nice is said to have made it the Metropolitan See of Persia, during the episcopate of St. Simeon.

8777 The father of Sapor died before the birth of his son; and the Magians, that he might be born a king, performed the ceremony of his coronation upon the pregnant mother; so that the wicked life and bloody reign of this vainglorious tyrant began together in the year 310. But our author, in saying that the latter was about the middle of the fourth century, refers to that part of it which was rendered most remarkable by his third, and most cruel, persecution of the Christians.

8778 The happy penitent was too much afflicted at his apostasy to be ablicitous for his honor, and seems to have made this request in order that the real cause of his death, being made public, the scandal which he had given might be repaired.—ED.

8779 Hist. eccl. 1. 2, c. c-11.

8780 Alban Butler adds that St. Eucherius, Bishop of Lyons, wrote the panegyric of these saints, in which he says that the dust of their tomb was distributed over the whole country for the benefit of the sick. The virtue of this dust is also attested by St. Gregory of Tours. He says that their bodies in the sixth century lay deposited with the body of St. Irenæus, under the altar of the Church of St. John, that at present bears the name of St. Irenæus. The relics of St. Epipodius and St. Alexander were discovered and solemnly translated in 1410.-ED.

8781 Matt. vii. 14.

8782 The names of St. Paregorius and St. Leo, martyred at Patara, are not found in the Roman martyrology; but the Bollandists and Ruinart give their acts as trustworthy, and the Greeks celebrate their feast on February 18. As for the time of their martyrdom, it is unknown; several think that it took place in the third century.—ED.

8783 Later on a magnificent church was at first erected in this place that became famous for its great number of miracles; there a very celebrated monastery was built, and finally a city under the name of St. Alban, between Birmingham and London.—ED.

8784 Dom Ruinart gives the Acts of this martyr with those of Saints Andrew, Paul, and Dionysia, or Denysa, whose triumph has been already related at page 116.—ED.

8786 At present a city in the province of Naples.

8787 Dom Ruinart adds the following extract from manuscripts in the Vatican Library: "The holy martyrs Nicander and Marcian, as also Daria, the wife of Nicander, and his son, terminated their career at Venafro. The Christians carried off their bodies, and buried them near the place where they had been beheaded; afterwards a church was built here in their honor." And Cardinal Baronius, in his notes upon the martyrology, cites another author (Petrus de Natalibus, in Catal. 1. 5, c. 90), who assures us that the wife of St. Nicander also underwent the capital punishment three days after her husband.—ED.

8788 See note, page 189.

8789 This church gives title to a Cardinal. In 1773 it was given by Clement XIV. to the Blessed Paul of the Cross, Founder of the Congregation of the Passionists—a work which he had begun with his brother John Baptist. The Holy Father, while making this donation graciously called to mind the names of the two brothers: Joannes et Paulus.—ED.

8791 "Benedicam Dominum in omni tempore; semper laus ejus in oremeo."—Ps. xxxiii. 2.

8792 We are here informed that the martyrs were nine in number—five catechumens, and four whose names are given; but from their Acts, most correctly edited by Ruinart, it appears that the saints who are named were four of the five catechumens; the fifth was one Revocatus. They were afterwards joined by Saturus, who voluntarily surrendered himself to the persecutors, and is mentioned by St. Perpetua in the narration of her first vision.—ED.

8793 We have judged it necessary to modify somewhat a few passages of this interesting account after authentic Acts collected with much care and given entire by Ruinart and Alban Butler. By them we are informed that Felicitas was seven or eight months gone with child, and that Perpetua had yet a father, an old man still very much attached to paganism; her mother was evidently a Christian, as was one of her two brothers, the other being a catechumen; her infant was yet at her breast, and she nursed it herself. We observe that St. Saturus is not mentioned in the Roman martyrology.—ED.

8794 The Acts state that Saturus suffered with the rest, and also relate a vision with which he was honored. We are assured by the same venerable authority, that St. Perpetua was favored with two other most important visions. She had a young brother, named Dinocrates, who died when he was only seven years of age, of a most hideous ulcer in the face. She recollected his death during her imprisonment; and having prayed for his repose, saw him in a vision, with the ulcer on his face, having a most squalid appearance, and endeavoring to drink from a vessel which he could not reach. After her vision she knew that her brother was in pain, and continued to pray fervently for his relief. She was accordingly favored with a second vision, in which she saw him quite clean, refreshing himself with the water, and retaining only a scar where the ulcer had formerly been. "I knew," she says, "from this vision, that he had been released from his pain." It has been thought worth while to mention these visions of St. Perpetua, as they must be most acceptable to the reader, since they show that the existence of a place of temporary punishment after death, and prayers for the departed, were doctrines of the Church as early as the year 203. Ruinart, in his "Admonitio in passionem, SS. Perpet. et Fclic., num. 6," refutes the opinion of Valesius, that the compiler of these Acts was a Montanist, because these heretics pretended to have many supernal illustrations, and like the fanatics of our own days, extraordinary impulses from the Holy Spirit. He also mentions a letter written to Valesius, wherein the writer endeavors to prove from his style in similar productions that Tertullian was the original compiler. Indeed, St. Perpetua herself has been most unjustly charged with Montanism by the enemies of Catholic doctrine, but the imputation is as injudicious as it is unjust, since it establishes beyond a doubt the authenticity of the Acts, which could not be denied, and palpably manifests the straits to which heresy is driven. How could the Church rank as a martyr a woman belonging to a sect universally condemned for their blasphemous errors, and loathed and abhorred for their enormous extravagances? St. Augustine himself, although he declares (Lib. 1, de anima, ad Renatum, et Lib. 3, ad Vincent.) that the Revelations of St. Perpetua are not to be placed in the Canon of Scripture, nevertheless styles them "Divine Revelations," and calls upon the faithful to honor them—Exhortationes earum in DIVINIS REVELATIONIBUS, cum legerentur, audivimus . . . mente spectavimus, religione honoravimus." S. Aug. Serm. 1, de SS. Perpet. et Felic.-ED.

8798 Dom Ruinart and Giry add that the body of St. Perpetua, taken later to France, was resting in their time at the Abbey of St. Peter of Vierzon.—ED.

8800 Istor. eccl. l. 9, n. 30.

8801 Their Acts contain another interesting fact. Before retiring the governor commanded ten soldiers to intermix the bodies with those of the gladiators who had been slain, and to guard them in order that they might not be recognized and the Christians might not be able to carry them off. Several, however, approached in the darkness and implored the help of God with great fervor; their prayers were heard. The night was very dark and a violent thunderstorm with rain dispersed the guards. The faithful distinguished the three bodies by a miraculous star or ray of light that streamed on each of them. They joyfully carried off the precious treasures and hid them in a hollow cave in the neighboring mountains, where the governor was not able, by any search that he could make, to find them.—ED.

8803 Matt. x. 23.

8804 The holy bishop retired, however, only when he was obliged to do so on account of the persecution, following in this the counsel and example of the divine Master. This we find in his office as well as in the Acts collected by the Bollandists.—ED.

8805 Four different manuscript acts of this saint have been published by Bollandus, who observes that the first, which was found in a monastery of Canons Regular, is of very great antiquity. These four MSS. agree in the leading facts, and all mention the circumstance of the beasts visiting our saint and being blessed by him. The MS. III. compares St. Blase, in this respect, to Daniel in the den of lions, and to Elias in the wilderness, and MS. IV., which was in the possession of Cardinal Baronius, observes that, as the prophet was fed by ravens, so our saint was supplied with food by the wild beasts that frequented his cave. As it was the sin of man that first rendered animals savage towards him, it has been regarded as a proof of the innocence and sanctity of a person to find wild beasts inoffensive and familiar with him; and several instances of this mark of holiness are to be met with in the "Lives of the Saints." The blessing of those beasts by St. Blase will remind some readers of the ceremony still performed at Rome, on St. Anthony's day, 17th January, when hors es and other useful animals are assembled before the church, and blessed. This ceremony has been the subject of much unbecoming and inconsiderate ridicule, for it should be remembered that, in the beginning, the Almighty Creator himself blessed all his creatures; and, after the fall of man, pronounced a curse upon the earth. It is to avert as much as possible the effects of this malediction that we pray for the giving and preserving of the fruits of the earth, and for the well-being of those animals that God has created for our benefit, and for the manifestation of his own almighty power. Yet the man who, with scrupulous punctuality, says grace before meat, and implores the blessing of heaven on the roasted ribs of an ox upon his table, will ridicule the benediction invoked over the living animal, when standing at the foot of the Esquiline!—ED.

8807 Victor in Latin signifies a conqueror.

8808 These holy relics were preserved at Marseilles in the cathedral church and in that of St. Victor, till the revolution of 1793, the sacrilegious deeds of which deprived the Church of this treasure as well as of many others. Two celebrated abbeys bore the name of St. Victor: one of the Benedictines at Marseilles, erected at the beginning of the fifth century on the tomb of the glorious martyrs by the illustrious abbot John Cassian; the other of the regular Canons at Paris, where two distinguished authors lived, often cited by St. Alphonsus, namely, Hugo of St. Victor, a Belgian, and his disciple Richard, a Scotchman.—Ed.

8810 Peristeph. hymn. 3.

8811 Alban Butler and Giry cite several churches in France that possessed relics of St. Laurence, but it is probable that they possess them no longer in consequence of the outrages of the Calvinists of the 16th century, and of the revolutionists of 1793.

We read in the annals of Erstein, in Alsace, that the Empress Irmengard, the wife of Lothair I., obtained from Pope Leo IV., about the year 850, the body of St. Sixtus II., and that he had it buried in the abbey of Erstein, the church of which bore the name of this holy Pope.

The relics of St. Romanus were transferred to Lucca, where they are kept under the high altar of the church that bears his name.—ED.

8812 Acta S. Sebast. apud Boll.

8813 This is the account given by Surius, who quotes Metaphrastes; but it is far more probable that our saint's parents, however virtuous, were poor. St. Gregory Nazianzen concludes one of his sermons with an allusion to the saint, and calls him "the renowned Mammas, a shepherd and a martyr." St. Basil also has an admirable homily upon this blessed martyr, who seems to have been celebrated among the Greeks. The object of the homily is to show that poverty and humility constitute real glory; and that, although custom may warrant the profane panegyrist in extolling the character of a person by referring to the nobility of his birth and to the glorious achievements of his ancestors, yet the laws of truth shall forever prohibit us from praising any one except for his own virtues. The holy Father insists that our saint was but a poor shepherd, who could boast of no worldly distinction; and indeed the reader is inclined to suspect that he was anxious to contradict some apocryphal accounts that would attribute noble ancestry to St. Mammas, for he emphatically says, "Yes, a shepherd! Let us not be ashamed of the truth. Let us not imitate the profane writers of fable."—St. Basil hom. xxiii. in Mamant. martyr.

8815 St. Genesius did not receive the sacrament of regeneration, as the player did not intend to do that which the Church doth, but merely to represent and ridicule her most sacred rites. Our saint, however, received the baptism of martyrdom.—ED.

8822 It was to Galerius Maximianus that our saint was physician. This emperor conceived a great liking for him, on account of his great talents and extraordinary beauty, and placed him under the tuition of the celebrated Euphrosymus. It has been said of St. Pantaleon that he had apostatized upon his reception at court, and that St. Hermolaus merely encouraged him to retract this false step; but the Acts state that he was baptized by his friend, and although he himself says that his mother exhorted him to profess the Christian religion, it does not appear that he ever did so previously to his baptism.—Ed.

8823 From this circumstance it may be supposed that Hermolaus was a priest; the Acts are silent on this point.-Ed.

8824 St. Hermolaus and his two companions, Hermippus and Hermocrates, suffered before St. Pantaleon.—ED.

8827 This notice is wanting in several Italian editions; we find it in the Turin edition of 1831. St. Alphonsus seems to have based his narrative on the work of Father Crasset, "History of the Church in Japan," published at first under the pseudonym of "M. l'Abbé T."

The empire of Japan, situated northwest of China, is composed of a great number of islands, the area of which is about the same as that of California, which lies due east, and its population is nearly equal to that of the United States. Its capital is Tokyo, formerly called Jedo. Although within the last half-century the Japanese have been compelled to change their foreign policy, and have even sent several embassies to Europe, still, as late as 1870, 4000 Christians from one valley alone were exiled for their faith.

It was on the 15th of August, 1549, that St. Francis Xavier landed in Japan to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Forty years afterwards there were seen a great number of servants of the true God in every condition of life, some of them even near the throne; the Christian religion was dominant in several kingdoms, so that towards the beginning of the 17th centtiry, according to trustworthy writers, the church in Japan numbered two million Catholics.—ED.

8828 Protasius was his baptismal name, and he took the name of John when he received confirmation. We may read about his heroic death in Chapter VII.—ED.

8829 These twenty-six martyrs, beatified in 1627 by Pope Urban VIII., were canonized by Pius IX., June 8, 1862, on the feast of Pentecost, in the presence of about three hundred bishops who had come from all parts of the world. Their feast is fixed for the 5th of February, the day on which they consummated their sacrifice. The following are their names and their rank:

Six Franciscan Religious; namely, the three priests, Fathers Peter Baptist, aged fifty-two; Martin de Aguirre, or of the Ascension, aged thirty; and Francis Blanco, aged thirty—all Spaniards; one cleric. Philip of Jesus or Las Casas, aged twenty-three, born in Mexico; two lay-brothers, Francis of St. Michael, aged fifty-four, a Spaniard, and Gonzalvo Garcia, aged twenty-five, born in the Indies of Portuguese parents.

Seventeen Japanese who, before going to execution, were received into the Third Order of St. Francis; namely, Michael Cozaki and his son Thomas, aged fourteen; Anthony, aged thirteen; Paul Ibarki and his younger brother, Leo Garazuma, with their nephew Louis, a boy of eleven; Paul Suzuki; Francis, a physician of Meaco, aged forty-six; Come Toja or Takia; Thomas Danki; Bonaventure or Ventura; Gabriel, aged nineteen; John Kisnia or Kimoia; Joachim Saquir or Saccakibara, aged forty; Matthias, a substitute for another of the same name; Francis Fahelente, Peter Sukegiro.

Three Japanese Jesuits, namely, Father Paul Miki, aged thirty-three, with two novices, John de Goto, aged nineteen, and James Kisai, aged sixty-four, who made their vows on the very day of their martyrdom. The Jesuits had not then been included in the sentence of condemnation; but the governor of Ozaka had these three arrested as they were in the city, and joined them to the Franciscans, against whom this persecution was chiefly directed.-ED.

8834 As for his wife and child, see note in chap. xvii.

8835 As these illustrious conquerors will probably not fail, as we have been assured, to receive the honors of triumph in the Church, as we have seen in the case of those mentioned, Chapter II., page 326, we deem it useful to give a list of their names.

There were eight Dominicans; namely, the Dominican Fathers Moralez, Alphonse de Mena, Ange Ferrier, Joseph and Hyacinthe Orfanelli; the brothers Alexis and Thomas; John, of the Third Order. The first six were burnt.

Four Franciscans: Fathers Peter d'Avila and Richard of St. Anne; Brothers Leo and Vincent. All four perished by fire. Father Richard is he of whom St. Alphonsus relates the example in the Glories of Mary, P. 1. ch. viii. § 1 (Vol. VII. p. 233).

Nine Jesuits: Fathers Charles Spinola, who was very celebrated, being regarded as the chief of this glorious phalanx, and Sebastian Quimura; the novices whose vows were received by Father Spinola before the execution, Peter Sampo, Gonzalve Fusai, Thomas Acafoxi, Michael Xumpo, Anthony Kiuni, Louis Cavara, and John Ciungocu. All were condemned to the fire; but the last one was be headed, for want of a stake to which to tie him.

The four seculars delivered up to the flames were: Anthony—of Corea, Paul—, Anthony Sanga, and Lucius Fraitez.

Twenty-seven seculars beheaded: Isabella Fernandez, widow of Dominic George, (Chap. XI. page 364), and his son Ignatius, aged four years; Mary, widow of Andrew Tocuan, a martyr; Apollina, a widow; Agnes, widow of Come, a martyr; Marina, a widow; Mary, wife of Anthony of Corea, condemned to the fire; his son, John aged twelve; and his brother Peter, a ged three; Mary, widow of John Xun, a martyr; Dominica, a widow; Magdalen, wife of Anthony Sanga, condemned to the fire; Mary, wife of Paul—, also condemned to the tire; Catharine—; Thecla, wife of Paul Nangaxi, the one who, having come forth from the fire, re-entered it voluntarily, and his son Peter, aged seven; Dominic Nacavo, son of Matthias, a martyr; Peter Motoiurna, aged five, son of John, a martyr; Bartholomew Cavano;

Dominic Yamanda; Damian—, and his son Michael, aged five; Thomas—; Clement and his son Anthony, aged three; Rufus Clare, wife of a martyr.—ED.

8836 We shall hear of his martyrdom in the following chapter.

8842 Before concluding 1 will here relate a very edifying occurrence. Toward the end of the mission there was a religious of the Order of St. Augustine, who to remain unknown became a vender of chestnuts, and entered under this disguise one of the vessels. As he asked too much for his chestnuts someone gave him a blow on the cheek; but he received this affront without the slightest emotion, and continued quietly to offer his chestnuts for sale. The idolaters, observing that such meekness was not a virtue practised among them, suspected the vender of being a Christian, arrested him and put him to death, after the religious had openly professed his faith. Wonderful power of the grace of Jesus Christ, who gives to his servants the strength to practise virtues unknown among pagans!

8845 See note, page 435. The first three of these hymns are taken from one of the volumes examined during the process of the canonization of St. Alphonsus, and the first is mentioned in his Life, 1. i. ch. 3, either by Father Tannoia or by Cardinal Villecourt. As to the fourth, it is sung in Italy during the visits to the Blessed Sacrament as one of the hymns of our saint, and there is no doubt that he is the author.—ED.

10413 This summary is an appendix that belongs to the work, as may be seen, page 160. The author has made a similar one for the faithful in general, as we may see in Vol. III., page 360.—ED.

10415 These Aspirations are also referred to, page 156.

10416 Volumes XIII. and XIV. treat of the Holy Mass and of the divine Office; volumes XV. and XVI. of missions and of preaching, and a subsequent volume containing Pastoral letters.

10417 Selva di materie predicabili ed istruttive, per dare gli esercizj ai Preti, ed anche per uso di lezione privata a proprio profitto ; The author informs us in his preface that he did not endeavor to put much order into the collection of ideas suitable for each subject; we, however, perceive that there is more order in it than he would have us believe.

In order the better to understand the author, we have, as much as possible, divided each subject into paragraphs; by such an arrangement the subjects are not only more easily grasped and retained, but we may most conveniently use this book either for meditation or for spiritual reading.

10418 St. Alphonsus was not yet a bishop when he published this work; he was appointed to this office two years later.

10419 We read in a treatise entitled L INFALLIBILITE ET LE CONCILE GENERAL, ch. 8, written by Cardinal Dechamps, a note that is to the point. After having called St. Alphonsus " the most faithful and the most powerful Echo of tradition in modern times," the eloquent Cardinal explains that our author was, however, not a simple echo in his dogmatical, in his moral. .or in his ascetical works, on which he passes a eulogy which he concludes as follows: " Among his ascetical works there is one that St. Alphonsus has modestly entitled a COLLECTION of texts. At first sight one might believe that this is true; but if one reads the book attentively one sees that the thought of the author—is the framework of the whole, and that the strongest and the sweetest that tradition contains he skilfully adapts to the service of his pen.

12368 We have thought it useful to add here the formula which the saint gives elsewhere in several places. ED.

12369 To understand this passage and others of a like nature, we must know that many secular priests in Italy remained with their families, having no special employment; this was the case with St. Alphonsus himself at the beginning of his priestly life. ED.

12370 We may remark that nothing is said about breakfast, because in Italy, generally, no meal is taken as in the countries of the north, but dinner is taken earlier. ED.

12371 " Terram miseriæ et tenebrarum, ubi umbra mortis, et nullus orao, sed sempiternus horror inhabitat." Job, x. 22.

12372 It may perhaps be needless to recall here to mind the ascetical works written by St. Alphonsus himself. Many well-instructed priests avow that they seek no other books of piety, because they find all that they desire in those of the holy bishop, who seems to have provided for all the wants of the soul. ED.

12373 We all know the Visits to the Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin which are found in Volume VI. This precious little work is also published separately. ED.

12374 There is no question here of the annual retreat. ED.

12398 This discourse, which remained unpublished till 1869, was found among the manuscripts of St. Alphonsus preserved at Rome. From its context we see that it was composed for retreats that are given to priests and to candidates for Holy Orders, and it seems that it was composed before 1737, since the author gives on page 446 only the title of Blessed to St. John Francis Regis, canonized at this time by Pope Clement XII ED.

12448 This is, however, not a mere abridgment that St. Alphonsus gives us. As was usual with him, he appropriated the subject and treated it after his own manner by confining himself to quoting on some points the opinion of the French author. What he ascribes to the latter is found, nearly word for word, in the book entitled "L'Idee du Sacerdoce et du Sacrifice de Jesus-Christ, par le R. P. De Condren, etc. Par un Pretre de l'Oratoire." We doubt, however, whether his excellent work is that which our Saint had before him; for it appears to us that such a work cannot be called anonymous, though the learned Oratorian who published it in 1677 gives in the title-page only his title, and the initials of his name in his dedication, by signing himself P. Q. (This is Father Pasquier Quesnel, who later on became unfortunately so famous.) This doubt is confirmed by the remark that we add further on, page 36, and is changed almost into certainty in view of a passage that we read on page 46, and that we have not seen in the aforesaid work. We therefore believe that there exists a more recent work in which "L'Idee" of Father De Condren is reproduced in an incomplete manner and without the name of the author. —ED.

12469 It seems to us that the two explanations which we have just read—the explanation of the anonymous author and that of St. Alphonsus—about the consummation or the last two parts of the Sacrifice of Jesus Christ can be and should be admitted, should not exclude each other, but should be united. It was necessary that this great sacrifice, the only real sacrifice worthy of God, should be consummated in heaven and on earth at the same time, to unite to God the body of Jesus Christ entirely; that is, the Church triumphant and the Church militant: in heaven, by the glorious union of Jesus Christ, of the Blessed Virgin, of the angels, of the saints with God, and among themselves in the bosom of God in which the sacrifice is perfect and eternal: on earth, by Holy Mass and Communion, in which all the faithful partake of the same victim under the Eucharistic veil. The body of the Redeemer, immolated on the Cross, had, therefore to be transformed in a twofold manner; namely, by the resurrection, for the consummation of the sacrifice in heavenly glory; by the Eucharist, for the consummation of the sacrifice in earthly combats. This twofold consummation of the true sacrifice was typified in the ceremonies of the Old Law: the burning of the victim represented heavenly Communion, and the eating of it represented earthly Communion. But in heaven, as in Holy Mass, we have not only consummation, but we have all the parts of the Sacrifice of the Cross and of the sacrifices of the Old Law. Hence, three kinds of sacrifices, or three degrees, are to be distinguished. In the Old Law there were figures without the reality; in the New Law we have the reality under the figures or appearances; in glory we have the reality exposed and unveiled. Such is, briefly, the thought of Pere De Condren, wisely developed by him who published it. Such is, also, without doubt, the thought of St. Alphonsus; for otherwise we should not understand what he says on page 32, where he explains the text taken from Daniel.—ED.

12503 De Miss. Sacr. 1. 2, c. 15.—Benedict XIV. here observes that St. Thomas (P. 3, q. 18, a. 3) seems to favor the opinion of those who make the essential form of the consecration of the chalice consist in all the words that the priest pronounces as far as Hœc quotiescumque; because the words that follow, Hic est enim calix sanguinis mei, are determinationes, prædicati, that is to say, sanguinis Christi, and consequently, belonging ad integritatem ejusdem locutionis, are de substantia formæ. St. Pius V. caused the contrary opinion to be erased from the commentary of Cajetan,

Communiter negant, quia in Rubrica non adest de illis præceptum, sed tantum insinuatio, cum ibi, in præparatione Missæ, solummodo dicatur: 'Orationes pro temporis opportunitate (hoc est, commoditate) dicendæ.' Hoc tamen non obstante, Sacerdotem, qui sine ulla præparatione, saltem domi facta, ad sacrificandum accederet, puto ab aliqua culpa non excusandum."—(Theol. mor. 1. 6, n. 410.) Our author does not comprise among these prayers of mere counsel those that one recites in putting on the vestments, nor those that one should say at the end of Mass, Ch. XI. n. 14; they do not bear the title Pro temporis opportunitate, but are positively prescribed.

12537 S. R. C., Sept. 27, 1659.

12540 S. R. C., June 8, 1709,

12541 The palm or span is equal to nine inches.–ED.

12543 A white handkerchief is more becoming.

12545 As to the server, see Appendix, § X.

12546 In the Rubric of the Missal it is not said whether the reverence is to be profound or moderate. Authors agree that the profound is to be made to the cross or image of the crucifix; the moderate, to the image of the Blessed Virgin; but the simple, to the image of the other saints.

12547 The head is inclined when in the hymn Gloria in excelsis the word Deo is pronounced, and at Deum in the symbol Credo in unum Deum.

12550 Martinucci.1. 1, c. 18, n. 21, says: "Manum oblique bursæ imponens, ne quid a calice decidat."

12553 St. Alphonsus gives some other details on this subject in his Moral Theology,1. 6, n. 396.

12555 Here no inclination to the cross is to be made (Schober, page 22. note 22).

12556 Baldeschi, p. 1. art. 3, n. 27, recommends tha the coporal be so extended that the last fold that is towards the celebrant and the front of the altar be the last opened; and the same be first closed, lest there be danger of losing the fragments that may have inadvertently remained. Bauldry, p. 3, tit. 2, n. 3, and Hagerer, tit. 2, n. 2, say that it is a fault against the Rubric not to un fold it immediately and to wait till the Offertory. The same must be said if any one does not open the front fold of the corporal, but keeps it closed till the Offertory; because the Rubric says nothing of this practice.–(Schober, page 23, n. 23.)

What is to be thought of those that are accustomed nearly always to say the whole Canon by heart? Schober answers (page 27, n. 28): "Sine dubio in re tam gravissima saltem interdum periculo lethaliter peccandi se exponunt. . . . Ipsa Rubrica saltem indirecte requirit ut Canon ex libro legatur. . . . Si tamen quidam auctores requirunt, ut totus Canon ex libro legatur et non memoriter recitetur, id non ita rigide intelligi debet, ut aliqua pauca ejusdem verba, maxime quæ cum gestibus conjuncta sunt, non possint memoriter recitari, dummodo probe sciantur, aut ex præcedenti obtutu bene recenterque fuerint memoriæ tradita."

12560 "An, in Missis privatis, permitti possit ministro aperire Missale et invenire Missam?" To this question the Congregation of Rites answered, September 7, 1816: "Negative, et serventur Rubricæ."

12562 According to note 2, page 96, this genuflection is to be made on the lowest step.

12564 See Theol. Moral, lib. 6, n. 413.

12566 There are various decrees forbidding the adding to the Confiteor of the name of a saint. However, the S. C. R., through a special favor, has allowed religious communities to use the name of the founder. If the priest celebrates without a server, he should not say the Confiteor twice.

12567 According to the Rubric of the Mass which is celebrated by a bishop, it is not allowed the ministers to say: tibi vel te Reverendissime Pater.

12569 The Rubric says (1. c. n. 3): "Elevansque usque ad humeros (quod in omni manuum elevatione observatur)"; Cærem. Episcop. lib. ii. cap. n. 38: "Elevatisque manibus ad altitudinem humerorum."

12571 St. Alphonsus seems to admit either opinion. It is certain that the Rubric does not prescribe that the hands be joined in the case above mentioned. The Congregation of Rites, consulted on this point, answered, November 12, 1831: "Serventur Rubricæ."

Facilius quidem poterant levari, sed etiam faciliter decidebant. . . . cum hodie conspicilla modo penitus diverso et magis convenienti adhibeatur, difficiliusque deponi et iterum firmari possint, non videtur amplius necessarium, illa ad quamcumque actionem infra Missam deponere, quum insuper juxta Rubricas generales, tit. xx.: 'super altare nihil omnino ponatur, quod ad Missæ sacrificium vel ipsius altaris ornamentum non pertineat.' Sic vero practicatum videmus ab optimis quoque sacerdotibus. Si quis autem utatur perspicillis, quæ antiquis similia sunt et germanice Zwicker, gallice Pince-nez vocantur, ea deponere debet, quandocumque ad populum se vertit."—(Schober, page 40, note 1.)

12576 "Easque tenet usque ad finem," the Rubric adds (1. c., tit. V. n. 1).

12577 Or "if at the beginning of the prayer mention is made of the Son."—(Rubric, gen, tit, n, 17.)

12579 Baldeschi and most of the authors say that the head should be raised immediately.—(See Schober, page 41, note 6.)

12580 Also in the prayer for the Pope when he is mentioned the head is always inclined—not, however, to the cross. Likewise at the name of the bishop the head is to be inclined towards the book when his prayer is said; as also when the name of the Blessed Trinity is uttered the head is inclined as at the name Jesus. This inclination takes place whether the three Persons are either expressly named together, as in Deo Patri sit gloria, or when the name of the Blessed Trinity is expressly mentioned at the end of the hymns.—(S. R. C., August 12, 1854.)

12583 The S. R. C., Sept. 7, 1844, answered: "Inclinationem capitis non esse faciendam at the words optimam partem elegit sibi Maria quæ non auferetur ab ea in æternum," words found in the Mass of the feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin.

12584 The conclusion is always such as is required by the prayer to which it is added, no regard being had to the preceding prayers.

12585 No inclination is to be made, as the Rubric does not proscribe it.

12587 Nempe tertia Oratio.

12588 In reference to the prayer A cunctis the following decisions are to be considered:

1. In the prayer A cunctis the name of S. Joseph is always to be added—in the words cum beato Joseph—after the invocation of the Blessed Virgin and before all other patron saints, except the angels and St. John the Baptist. This also holds good for the Post-Communion.—(S. C. R., April 22, 1871.)

2. At the letter N. in the prayer A cunctis there must be mentioned in every church the name of the patron or the titular saint of the church in which one celebrates Mass. But if the name is already mentioned, it need not be mentioned again (S. C. R., Nov. 12, 1831); and then the two words atque beato should be omitted.

If this church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity, to the Holy Cross, to the Holy Spirit, or any other mystery, no mention is made of them; and the two words atque beato are omitted. We also omit them for reasons given above if the church is dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, to St. Michael, to St. John the Baptist, to St. Joseph, to St. Peter, or to St. Paul.—(S. C. R., Apr. 16, 1853.)

In a chapel or oratory without a patron or titular saint we must always take the name of the patron either of the city or of the country.—(S. C. R., Febr. 15, 1873.)

If there are several patrons, we must place them according to the order that each one occupies in Litaniis majoribus.—(S. R. C., Sept. 28, 1865.)

3. May religious invoke their holy founder in the two prayers A cunctis and Mundet? Yes, provided they do not omit the patron or the titular saint.—(S. C. R., June 17, 1843.)

12590 The Munda cor should not be begun until after the priest has profoundly inclined.

12591 Here the Rubric of the Missal expressly prescribes an inclination.

12592 A blind priest authorized to say always a votive Mass cannot say Mass with Credo on a Sunday.—(Schober. p. 58.)

12593 The Credo should be said on both feasts of St. Joseph; namely, in festo natali, as well as in alio ipsius Patrocinii, etiam in casu translationis extra Dominicam.—(S. R C., April 22, 1871.)

12594 At present all the Doctors of the Church have their feasts sub ritu duplici. St. Mary Magdalen has a Credo in the Mass celebrated on her feast.

12597 St. Alphonsus follows here Merati; others deny that the hands are to be raised, for the Rubric says: "Extendens et jungens manus, caputque inclinans, dicit Oremus."

12598 Although some drops of the precious blood may still remain in the chalice, no genuflection is made either in leaving the middle of the altar, or returning to it.—(S. R. C., July 20, 1686.)

12601 The Rubric of the Missal says nothing about an inclination to the cross.

12607 Here the Rubric prescribes no inclination of the head.

12609 The Rubric, however, does not prescribe any inclination; hence it should be omitted.

12610 No inclination is here prescribed by the Rubric.

12611 The Rubric of the Missal says nothing about an inclination.

12613 According to the Rubric the hands are not to be raised higher, but are only to be joined.—(Sec Schober, page 73, note 35.)

12614 The Rubric should be observed, that is, the hands are not to be joined.—(See Schober, page 75, note 40.)

12615 Page 139.

or secundæ classis no commemoration is made. This rule does not apply to the Masses of the Dead: "An in festo Sanctorum qui nomi—nantur in Canone, si sint rit. semidupl. vel Missa dicatur de Requiem, inclinandum sit caput, quando in Canone nominantur prædicti Sancti?" S.R.C. respondit: "Negative." 1n una Panormitan. die 12 April, 1823. ad. 13, n. 4594.

12624 This is to be a simple minimarum maxima inclination.

12625 But the Rubric mentioned above says: "Cum autem finierit supradicta verba (i.e., benedixit, . . . ex hoc omnes), etc.

12628 Tom. 3, a. 17, qu. 2 (et in dissert. 1. 4).

12629 That is a simple minimarum maxima inclination.

12632 This is better explained by the foregoing Rubric of the Mass: "Cum dicit: Ex hac altaris," etc.

12633 The hands should be extended usque ad finem, according to the Rubric.

12635 Lib. 2, c. 8, n. 73.

12637 As the body is already inclined, no inclination of the head is to be made at the name Jesus.

12644 The Rubric of the Missal does not here prescribe an inclination of the head.

12645 No inclination is prescribed by the Rubric.

12647 Martinucci, 1. c. n. 142, says: "Sine ulla ad Crucem reverentia se convertet, descendet de altaris gradibus . . ." This is in accordance with the foregoing Rubric of the Missal. See also note 2, page 99.

12649 Here another genuflection is to be made before the priest takes the paten with the Host, according to the Rubric quoted above.

The priest is not allowed while administering holy Communion, either during or at end of Mass, to hold the paten between the fingers of his left hand, which carries the ciborium, for the purpose of placing it under the chin of those communicating (S. R. C. 12 Aug., 1854).

12651 "Praxis tamen Urbis habet, ut de altari, ubi expositum est Ss. Sacramentum, non detur Communio. Si Ss. Sacramentum exponatur eo tempore, quo fideles ad Communionem accedere solent, sacra pyxis in alio altari deponetur juxta praxim in Urbe. Et ita faciendum esse, scripsit Ven. Innocentius XI., die 20 Maji, 1682, ad Archiepiscopum Mechlinen. Si autem in ecclesia unicum altare reperiatur, permitti potest distribute sacræ Communionis intra vel extra Missam coram Sanctissimo super altari exposito.-S. R. C. die 26 Sept. . 1868, in una Rhemen. n. 5411."-(Schober, page 109, n. 4.)

12652 St. Alphonsus wishes that here, the priest having returned to the altar, should genuflect after covering the ciborium; but the S. R. C., December 23, 1862 (in una Romana, n. 5324), has decreed: " a sacerdote redeunte ad altare post fidelium Comnunionem genuflectendum, antequam cooperiat sacram in pyxidem, et iterum genuflectendum, antequam, pyxide in tabernaculo posita, ipsius tabernaculi ostiolum claudat." The holy Doctor is, however, right when, in opposition to Merati, he says that not three but only two genuflections are to be made.

12653 As to the renewal of the Hosts, see Schober, page 112, note 10.

12655 It is now decided that the stole: "Juxta Ritualis Rubricam debet esse coloris Officio convenientis."—(S. R. C. in una Trident., 12 March. 1836.)

12656 In plano.—(Decree of November 12, 1831.)

12657 The burse is sometimes found on the altar; sometimes the server carries it; however: "Decere ut a sacerdote deferatur."—(S. R. C. September 24, 1842.)

12659 "Tempore paschali," says the Rubric of the Roman Ritual, "dicitur Oratio: Spiritum nobis Domine," etc.—(Ex Post-communione Sabbati Sancti.)

12660 By the Roman Ritual there is prescribed in this prayer the entire conclusion: Qui vivis et regnas cum Deo Patri in unitate, etc.

12661 The versicles Domine exaudi and Dominus vobiscum should follow the versicle Panem de cælo and precede the prayer, as has been decided by the S. C. September 24, 1842.

12666 Agnus Dei is recited with the hands joined, not placed on the altar.—(Martinucci, 1. 1, c. 19, n. 11.)

12674 The hands are not raised higher. See Chapter VII., note 1.

12677 For further particulars see Wapelhorst, Compendium Sacræ Liturgiæ page 12.

12678 The altar is of stone, and represents Jesus Christ: Petra autem erat Christus (1 Cor. x. 4). Ipso summo angulari lapide Christo Jesu (Eph. ii. 20). In every consecrated church there is at least a fixed altar, the main altar, consecrated when the church is consecrated. The consecrated stone, which constitutes the portable altar, should be placed in the middle of the table of the altar a nd not far from its edge, so that one nny easily discover it by touching the altar-cloths that should cover the altar entirely. The fixed altar loses its consecration when it is broken in a notable manner, or when the table is taken away, or when the sepulcher of the relics is opened. The portable altar also loses its consecration by a considerable fracture, or by opening the sepulchre of the relics. (S. R. C., 14 Mart., 1693; 15 Maii, 1819; 3 Mart., 1821; 23 Maii. 1835; 6 Oct. 1837; 23 Maii, 1846; 23 Sept. 1848.) The relics enclosed in the altar are chiefly those of several martyrs; see what is said of this, page 40.

12679 S. R. C., 15 Maii, 1819.

12680 The ends of the top altar-cloth should fall usque ad terram, that is to say, to the base of the altar on both sides. A Pallium or Antipendium is also required, but only when the front of the altar is not sufficiently ornamented.

12681 When the Blessed Sacrament is exposed we should conform, in regard to the cross, to the usage established in each church (S. R. C., 2 Sept. 1741).

12682 S. R. C. 11 Jul. 1704.

12684 S. R. C., 10 Dec. 1857, n. 5255.

12685 Tabella Secretarum, cards containing the prayers that are to be recited in a low voice, secreto, with the Gloria in excelsis and the Credo, placed in the middle of the altar for the convenience of the celebrant. It is customary to place another at the Epistle corner for the prayer Deus qui Humanæ substantiæ and the psalm Lavabo, and still another on the other side for the last Gospel.

Ampullæ vitreæ. Cruets of glass are preferable for the sake of cleanliness, and in order to prevent the danger of using water instead ot wine; it is, however, permitted to use cruets of gold or silver (S. R. C. die 28 Aprilis, 1865).

12686 Theol. mor. 1. 6, n. 370, 386 et seq.

12688 Theol. mor. 1. 6, n. 376 et seq.

12689 We have seen above, on pages 84, 202, the opinion of St. Alphonsus in regard to the employment of vestments that are in a bad condition.

12690 We here give in a few words the meaning of the five colors used:

1. White, on the feasts of our Lord, indicates joy and glory; and on the feasts of the blessed Virgin, of the angels, of confessors, of virgins, and of other saints and martyrs, purity, innocence, and glorious immortality.

2. Red, at Pentecost, represents the Holy Ghost in the form of tongues of fire; and on the feasts of the Holy Cross and of martyrs, blood shed and love triumphant.

3. Green, at the Masses de tempore, from the octave of the Epiphany to Septuagesima, and from the octave of Pentecost to Advent, signifies an ordinary situation, which is neither that of joy nor that of sorrow. The Sundays that fall within the octave are excepted; for then the color of the octave is taken.

4. Violet well expresses the sentiments of humility and contrition, prayer joined to penance. It is used at the Masses de tempore in Advent, and from Septuagesima to Wednesday of Holy Week inclusively; on the Vigils and Ember days, except the Vigil and the Ember days of Pentecost and on the Vigil of Epiphany; on the Rogation days; on the feast of the Holy Innocents on account of the grief of the mothers, when this feast does not fall on a Sunday, on which the red color is used. Finally, in the votive Masses de Passione, pro quacumque necessitate, pro peccatis, ad postulandam gratiam bene moriendi, ad tollendum schisma, contra paganos, tempore belli, pro pace, pro vitanda mortalitate, pro iter agentibus, et pro infirmis.

12695 Theol. mor. 1. 6, n. 251, 215, et seq.-Homo Apost. tr. 15, n. 18.

12698 Sess. XIII. cap. VII.

12699 Prop. 38 et 39.

12700 The Rubric cited above, instead of Quamprimum, says: Cumprimum poterit. This means the same.

12701 Theol. mor. 1. 6, n. 278 et seq.

12703 To interior purity should be joined exterior decorum—propriety, order, and modesty. If these qualities are requisite in a priest in every place and at all times, they are much more required when he ascends the altar.

12705 Theol. mor. 1. 6, n. 352, 361, et seq.

12706 We read in the Rubric given at n. 2: Si quis, extra hujusmodi casus necessitatis, integra Sacramenta non sumpserit gravissime peccat.

12709 In alio calice, or in a vessel that is blessed; but if a second chalice can be had, it seems to be preferable to use it for finishing Mass by leaving the consecrated Wine in the first chalice according to the advice of Janssens.

12710 Servetur, in the tabernacle, but apart.

12712 Per negligentiam, as usually happens. Against this the Rubric warns us; but we must act in the same way if the thing takes place in consequence of any accident.

12713 Theol. mor. 1. 6, n. 250. According to Benedict XIV. (De Sacrif. M. 1. 3, c. 20.), the woman that communicates may in this case herself convey the Host to her mouth. We add that it will be proper for her to wash her fingers in a vessel, and to dry them with a purificator.

12715 Theol. mor. 1. 6, n. 340 et seq.

12716 We must remark that, even during the night preceding Christmas, it is not permitted to say a private Mass before the aurora, nor to give Communion.-(S. R. C., Dec. 7, 1641; Sept. 15, 1668; Sept. 18, 1781).

12718 Theol. mor. 1. 6, n. 382, 391, et 392.

12719 St. Alphonsus published this treatise in a volume, of which it formed the third part; the first part was composed of the treatise "The Ceremonies of the Mass," as may be seen in the preceding pages and the second of exercises on the Passion for preparation and thanksgiving, preceded by an introduction on the respect with which one should celebrate Mass, as we see at the end of this volume. See Tannoia and Villecourt, 1. 3, ch. 42. We add a few useful notes.—Ed.

12720 This is evidently an Italian translation of the work published in France in 1748, under the same title, and also without the name of the author. We have before us the second edition, which appeared in 1757. Feller ascribes it to Dom Guiard, a Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Maurus.

12722 "Distinguitur (fructus Missæ) in generalem, specialem, et specialissimum: fructus generalis obtingit omnibus fidelibus vivis et defunctis; specialis, ab aliis dictus medius vel ministerialis, obtingit tam eis pro quibus applicatur, quam assistentibus et concurrentibus ministrando paramenta, luminaria, hostias, etc.; specialissimus demum obtingit soli Sacerdoti." (Theol mor. 1. 6, n. 312.) Cardinal Gousset thus distinguishes these same fruits of the holy Sacrifice: "The general fruit, which is common to all the faithful, to the living, and to the dead detained in purgatory; the special fruit, which is for all those that attend or take some part in the celebration of the Mass; the very special fruit, which is particularly for those to whose intention the Mass is said; finally, the personal fruit for the priest who says the Mass."-(De l'Euch. n. 279.)

We also distinguish founded Masses from those Masses that are called manual.

We read, in the diocesan statutes of St. Alphonsus: "We recall to mind the grave obligation resting on all the priests not to defer the discharge of the promised Masses beyond two months if these are Masses for the living, nor beyond one month if they are Masses for the dead; so that, in order to be excused from a grave fault, they should be discharged within the time here indicated."—(Tannoia, 1. iii. 22, Notlif. 4.)

13056 "Omnis enim qui petit, accipit."—Luke, 9:10.

13057 See Psalm 77:21.

13058 "Juravi" (Num. 14:28).—"Si introibunt." Formula of imprecatory oath. See Psalm 88:35. St. Paul admirably comments on these last two verses, 4 and 5, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. 3 and 4.

13060 Jeremias (17:8) employs and develops nearly the same comparison.

13061 To be known by the Lord, says St. Augustine, is to live; to be ignored by him is to perish. See Psalm 36:18. Jesus Christ has also said in the same sense: "I know you not—Nescio vos" (Matt. 25:12).

13062 We may add: Acknowledge the king and the supreme Judge whom God places over you, and think of serving him only.

13066 There is in this verse a remarkable gradation.

13067 The literal translation of the Greek is: Justus, et fortis, et patiens, et non iram adducens omni die.

13068 In holy Scripture the word Vas often means instrument. (See Psalm 70:24; Is. 22:24; Jer. 50:25 and 51:20.)

13069 This passage has a twofold meaning. In the literal sense, it is applicable to men whom God has made masters over all earthly things: "Cælum cæli, Domino, terram autem dedit filiis hominum—The heaven of the heavens is the Lord's, but the earth hath he given to the children of men" (Ps. 113:25), But in the figurative sense it applies to Jesus Christ, as St, Paul attests (Heb. 2:6). God deigned to visit the human race by the Incarnation of the Word, who appeared then in some way inferior to the angels, especially in his Passion, but who afterwards was crowned with glory in his resurrection and ascension, when to his dominion were submitted the angels, men, and demons who, according to St. Augustine and Bellarmine, are typified by the animals that people the air, the earth, and the sea. "Omnia dedit ei Pater in manus—Knowing that the Father had given him all things into his hands" (John, 13:3). "Omnia enim subjicit sub pedibus ejus—For he hath put all things under his feet" (1 Cor. 13:13).

13070 At the gates of the city, where usually was assembled a crowd of people. See Psalm 72:28.

13071 Here the late Hebrew Doctors divide this psalm into two, making verse 22 the beginning of Psalm 10. And again they join the psalms 146 and 147 into one, in order that the whole number of psalms should not exceed one hundred and fifty. In this manner the psalms are numbered in the Protestant Bible.

13072 God observes all that, and he will punish him; see verse 37

13073 "Animæ meæ." A Hebraism for Mihi.

13074 The psalms, Bellarmine here remarks, are written in a poetical style; hence we see so many figures shine forth in them. For example, the word eyelids is put for the eyes; the word eyes for the mind; to interrogate, for to know perfectly, as after interrogations and a very exact examination.

13076 As in Psalm 27:4.

13077 See Psalm 52, as also the Epistle to the Romans, 3:10, where the Apostle cites a part of this psalm,

13079 St. Paul also (Acts, 13:35).—As this whole psalm is a continual prayer, says Bellarmine, the last four verses cannot be understood of Jesus Christ without applying to him the entire psalm, 13080 Motives of his confidence: his innocence and rectitude, the mercy and justice of God, the malice and iniquity of the wicked.

13082 Sub umbra alarum tuarum." The psalmist often uses this metaphor, which so well depicts the tenderness and goodness of the Lord towards his faithful servants. Our Saviour himself explains this touching signification in those words addressed to Jerusalem: "How often would I have gathered together thy children, as the hen doth gather her chickens under her wings" (Matt, 23:37).

13084 Holy Scripture often employs the word Cornu in the sense of strength or power, a metaphor taken from animals with horns.—The prophet began by saying to God: Fortitudo mea—Thou art my strength. He then explains (verses 1–3) in what way the Lord is his strength. In the Hebrew, as Bellarmine observes, the expressions are more figurative and energetic: for Firmamentum et Adjutor, the Hebrew word signifies rock, firm stone; Refugium, fortress; Protector, shield or buckler. The following verse is a kind of conclusion to this exordium; then comes the description of the help received from the Almighty.

13086 They attacked me unexpectedly.

13087 "Justitias." St. Jerome translates: Præcepta—Precepts. The same as in 2 Kings, 22:23.

13088 The psalmist arrives at the object that he seems chiefly to have in view; namely, the praise of the law of God, designated under various names, ordinarily given in Scripture as Lex, Testimonium, Justitiæ, Præceptum, Timor, Judicia. In these four verses (8–11) he describes eight beautiful characters on which it is important to meditate.

13089 Or those strangers that live far from Thee and Thy law.

13090 These two verses correspond to three verses of the preceding psalm (4, 5, and 6). In the following verses it is said that God not only heard the desires and the prayers of David, but that he anticipated and afterwards surpassed them by such favors as could not have their entire fulfilment except in the person of Jesus Christ, who was himself the greatest of the blessings granted to the holy king.

13091 Others understand: Thou wilt cause him to be blessed in all ages.

13094 See Psalm 60:2.

13095 "Legem pone mihi . . . in via tua." In the Hebrew, according to Bellarmine: Doce me; . . . and according to St. Jerome: Ostende mihi . . . viam tuam.

13096 Bellarmine gives several reasons showing that this psalm does not apply to David, but to Jesus Christ on the cross, according to the explanation of St. Augustine and St. Jerome. It is, he says, an abridgment of Psalm 21.

13097 5, 6. [27:5, 6] "Da . . . Tribue . . . Redde . . ." These words are not an imprecation, but a prophecy of what is to happen; this the following verse explains and proves.

13098 "Et in opera." According to the Hebrew and the Greek, the preposition in is redundant. St. Jerome's translation has: Et opus. On this passage Bellarmine makes an excellent reflection: All evils, he says, come from not applying ourselves to knowing and understanding the wonders worked by the Lord in the creation, redemption, and the government of the human race. If we attentively consider these things we could hardly refrain from loving God. Hence those words of our Saviour to Jerusalem: Si cognovisses et tu, et quidem in hac die tua quæ ad pacem tibi! . . . Non relinquent in te lapidem super lapidem, eo quod non cognoveris tempus visitationis tuæ—If thou also hadst known, and that in this thy day, the things that are to thy peace! . . . They shall not leave in thee a stone upon a stone; because thou hast not known the time of thy visitation (Luke, 19:42). And St. Paul says: Si enim cognovissent, nunquam Dominum gloriæ crucifixissent—If they had known it, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory (1 Cor. 2:8). Hence also: Desolatione desolata est omnis terra, quia nullus est qui recogitet corde—With desolation is all the land made desolate: because there is none that considereth in the heart (Jer. 12:2).

13099 "Refloruit caro mea." These words, applied to Jesus Christ, admirably foretell his resurrection.

13101 "Virtutem." By this word some understand the force of resisting enemies and of conquering them. Such is the conclusion of this poetical picture, in which the psalmist shows us in a few strokes the marvellous effects of the voice of God, which calls down the tempest and the thunder upon the elements of the physical world—water, air, fire, and earth,—and then upon the plants, animals, and men, to induce the latter to recognize the Providence of God, and to render him the homage that is due to him. In a figurative sense, as we may see in detail in Bellarmine, this Voice of God represents the preaching of the Gospel. We add that the Voice of the Lord (verses 3 and 8) prefigure in a perfect manner the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost, who descended upon the Apostles with a great noise under the forms of tongues of fire, as is so well expressed by these words of verse 7: Vox Domini intercidentis flammam ignis.

13102 So it is understood by several interpreters, such as Father De Carrières. But the psalm bears the title: Psalmus cantici, in dedicatione domus David—A psalm of a canticle at the dedication of David's house. This means, according to others, that David composed this psalm for the ceremony of his entrance into the palace that he had built for himself at Jerusalem (2 Kings, 5:11). As to the words Sanaste me (v. 2), they understand them of the deliverance from mental sufferings with which the psalmist had been afflicted in the midst of the mortal dangers that he had encountered. One may see in this psalm a picture of the vicissitudes of human life, over which God ever watches as a father and as a judge. In a higher sense, it is applicable to our Saviour in his resurrection; hence it forms part of the Office of Holy Saturday.

13103 This verse may signify: Thou hast preserved me from death, or, in a spiritual sense, from sin. When applied to Jesus Christ it well describes his resurrection, his soul coming forth from Limbo and his body from the tomb.

13104 By the night we may understand the present life; by the morning, the entrance into a blessed eternity.

13106 The subject is the same as that of Psalm 70.

13107 Thus most of the interpreters understand this verse as if it were substantially a repetition of the first; but others, with Bellarmine, who gives a detailed explanation of it, prefer the following meaning: Blessed is the man to whom the Lord hath not imputed sin, etc.; that is, Blessed is he who preserved his innocence. St. Paul (Rom. 4:7) cites these two verses.

13110 The prophet speaks thus of himself, and repeats what he said in verse 4. See also verse 17. "Non . . . omni bono." Hebraism for Nullo bono.

13111 This psalm is admirably suited to Jesus Christ, the Just by excellence. Bellarmine even thinks, with St. Augustine and St. Jerome, that this is its principal meaning.

13113 Or, according to St. Augustine, and conformably to verse 3: In his Salvation, his Saviour who is God himself.

13114 "Unicam meam" My soul, or my life, which is my only one. According to Bellarmine: Recte dicitur unica, quasi unice dilecta—Rightly it is called the only one, as being the one alone beloved. See the same expression in Psalm 21:21.

13115 Let us analyze this portrait of a perverse man: iniquity in his thought and affections, in his words, in his whole conduct towards God and man; the reason is, he has no fear of God; he does not see, he does not understand, he is not willing.

13116 Bellarmine remarks that this psalm does not form a consecutive discourse: it is a collection of detached sentences, to the number of twenty-two; and in the Hebrew they are arranged alphabetically, according to the first letter of each. The other alphabetical psalms are 24, 33, 110, 111, 118, and 144.

13118 Or else: Divine justice will cause . . . An ordinary prediction under the form of imprecation.

13120 A beautiful image of the paternal goodness of the Creator! See the same in Psalm 40:3.

13121 "Inhabita" The imperative for the future, according to Menochius. This promise, says Bellarmine, v. 28, 29, may be applied to the present life; but properly it has reference to life eternal.

13122 The same as verse 12; but there it was by violence, here it is by craft, as the Jews acted against Jesus Christ.

13123 This may also be understood in a higher sense, of eternal reward according to the text: Opera enim illorum sequuntur illos—Their works follow them (Apoc. 14:13).

13125 "Et dum commoventur." Bellarmine says that the particle Et is put here for Nam or Quia, as often happens in Scripture.

13126 Or, I was silent, although 1 had good things to say.

13128 A Hebraism signifying a prolonged waiting, accompanied by an rdent desire.

13129 For, according to what has been said at the head of the psalm, it is Jesus Christ who speaks in the person of his mystical Body. "petram." A stone that is raised and firm.

13130 "Sacrificium." St. Paul (Heb. 10:5) says: Hostiam. In the following verse we read: Holocaustum et (sacrificium) pro peccato—Holocaust for sin. These words designate the different sacrifices, or rather the bloody victims, such as bulls and lambs, which, in the Old Law, were offered on the altar to expiate sin (Lev. 1:4, 5, 6)—"Oblationem." By this may be understood offerings of inanimate gifts, such as flour, bread, oil, etc. (Lev. 2:6).

13132 "Legem tuam in medio cordis mei." Posui—1 have placed, is understood. That is to say: 1 have resolved from the bottom of my heart to execute all that Thou hast ordained.

13133 My iniquities, that is to say (as it is Jesus Christ that speaks): The sins of all men which I have assumed to expiate. Our divine Saviour, having accepted the sacrifice of the Passion to redeem the human race, by supplying the insufficiency of all other sacrifices, according to the will of his Father (verses 9, 10, 11) says that in spite of persecutions he publishes his mercy and his justice (verses 12, 13, 14). He then begs of his Father not to abandon him in his Passion and death, but to hasten the moment of his resurrection (verses 15 to 18). Finally, in the form of a prayer he predicts on one side the confusion of his enemies (verses 19, 20, 21), and on the other, the triumph of his faithful friends (verse 22). The last two verses are a summary of the entire psalm with regard to the person of Jesus Christ and his mystical Body, the Holy Church.

13134 See Psalm 69.

13135 The poor, the indigent man, is Jesus Christ suffering in his own person or in the members of his mystical body.

13136 A prediction or a promise in form of prayer. "In terra." Here on earth, and hereafter in the land of the living.

13137 Remark this touching apostrophe; the prophet seems to say: Yes, O my God! See what Thou hast done for Thy servant, and Thou wilt thus console him in all his tribulations, spiritual and corporal, so that he will say: Superabundo gaudio in omni tribulatione nostra—I exceedingly abound with joy in all our tribulation (2 Cor. 7:4). Compare this with what is said in Psalm 36:25.

13138 In this and in the following verses it is Jesus Christ that speaks. If he says that he has sinned, this must be understood of our iniquities which he took upon himself.

13140 "Mihi." A redundant pronoun, according to the Hebrew.

13142 See Psalm 42:6.

13143 The holy Fathers regard this psalm as prophetic. It is the people of God that speak: groaning under oppression, they represent to the Lord the benefits that they once received from his bounty; then they describe their present miseries, and ask the help that they need.

13144 "Plantasti eos." A significant metaphor, more fully developed in Psalm 79:10, 11, 12.

13146 We read in the title: Canticum pro Dilecto—A song for the Beloved. By this well-beloved we generally understand the Man-God, of whom the heavenly Father has said: Hic est Filius meus dilectus—This is my beloved Son (Matt. 3:17).

13147 Bellarmine says that these first two verses are a kind of preface admonishing us in a special manner that this psalm is a pure prophecy. The prophet then begins by a certain apostrophe, transported as it were with admiration without naming the hero to whom he addresses himself in his contemplation He exalts his personal qualities, his royal and divine dignity, the greatness and prosperity of his reign; then (verse 11) he eulogizes his Spouse, to whom he gives advice full of wisdom, and predicts (verse 18) the fruit of her sublime union; he concludes (verse 19) by saying that everything should contribute to the glory of our Lord.

13148 "Virga æquitatis." See Epistle to the Hebrews, in which St. Paul cites this and the following verse (Heb. 1:8).

13149 "Ejus." According to Bellarmine and other interpreters, this pronoun is redundant. "Filiæ Regis." The Spouse of the King is also he King's daughter; this is very applicable to the Church and to other significations.

13150 This verse is obscure. "In fortitudine ejus." Many refer these words to God, and translate: By his power.

13151 "Speciem Jacob." The beauty or the flower of the people of Israel, that is, the Apostles and the other disciples whom our Lord chose to form the first nucleus of his Church. This agrees with what St. Paul says (Rom. 11.).

13152 That is: Digne, attente, ac devote. The psalmist points out to us the principal titles that our Lord has to our homage and to our praise: his greatness and his power (verse 2); his benefits (verses 3, 4); his glory (verse 5); the power that he exercises over the whole earth by the triumph of his Church (verses 8, 9).

13153 "Tharsis." It is not known what this name designates; it is supposed to be India.

13155 These first four verses form the exordium. The prophet invites all men, of every condition, to listen most attentively to him. He then sets forth his subject: lessons of wisdom and prudence which he has meditated upon in his heart by obeying the divine inspiration, and which he will express in suitable and lofty language to the accompaniment of delicious music.

13156 "Redimet homo." Many interpreters understand these words in an interrogative sense: Shall another man redeem?

13157 Man, whom God has raised to so high an honor, by creating him according to his own image, with intelligence, reason, free will, immortality of the soul and dominion over all earthly things, does not understand his dignity, his high destiny: he can if he wishes reach the happiness of God himself, and he precipitates himself into the abyss of every evil. See Psalm 27:7.

13158 Many, observes Bellarmine, are called gods by different rights; namely, by a false creed, as the pagan divinities or the demons; by the grace of adoption, as the angels and saints; by similitude, as princes and judges. But all these gods are subject to one alone, who is the true God; called, therefore, the God of gods (see Psalm, 81:1, 6).

13159 In the verses 8 to 16, the Sovereign Judge declares to the servants of God that the sacrifices, that is, the material gifts that are offered to him, have of themselves no value in his eyes, since they are of no use to him, and everything belongs to him; they are agreeable to him only inasmuch as they faithfully represent the sentiments of the heart, such as faith, hope, charity, contrition, gratitude. See Psalm 50:17, 18. It is the heart that the Lord wishes and upon which he looks: Dominus autem intuetur cor—The Lord beholdeth the heart (1 Kings, 16:7). And it is thus that he appreciates the offering of the poor widow (Mark, 12:42). It is the same in regard to all meritorious acts that are rewarded in accordance with the pure intention and the interior sacrifice. See, moreover, the conclusion, verse 24. In the following verses, 17 to 23, the Lord points out to us that we shall have to render to him an account of the faults committed; namely, in our thoughts in our affections, in omissions, 18 and 22; in actions and co-operation, 19; in words, 20, 21.

13162 All the verses of this psalm, except verse 7, and some differences of expression are found in Psalm 13.

13164 "Vespere, et mane, et meridie." It was usual to pray especially three times a day (Dan. 6:10). Evening is put first, because then the celebration of the feasts began (Levit. 23:32). Hence the first Vespers in the office of the Church.

13166 David wrote this psalm on the occasion of his meeting Saul in a cave when this prince was pursuing him (1 Kings, 24). This is indicated by the title which reads: Cum fugeret a facie Saul in speluncam.

13167 Reference to the danger incurred by David when he was surrounded by the troops of Saul in the desert of Maon (1 Kings, 23:26).

13168 This verse and those that follow are reproduced in Psalm 107. with some slight differences of expression.

13169 Bellarmine, following Theodoret, says that David calls the spirit or the gift of prophecy his glory.

13170 There is, in the verses that precede, a succession of remarkable comparisons: verses 4. 5: the wicked become obstinate in evil like the adder, which is supposed to resist every means to charm or soften it; verse 6: they are violent like furious lions, but God renders them incapable of doing harm; verse 7: they advance as a torrent which threatens to swallow up everything on its way, but the waters flow away and disappear; verse 8: they melt away like wax before the fire; verse 9: they resemble a thorny shrub that is rooted up and buried in the ground before its thorns have acquired the strength to wound.

13172 Bellarmine remarks, with St. Augustine, that "Misericordia mea" means much more than Salus mea, Vita mea, Spes mea, and similar appellations; for it is to the mercy of God that we owe existence, life, deliverance from evil, and progress in good; it is by the mercy of God that we are predestined, called, justified, and that we shall at last be glorified.

13173 This verse and the following verses form the second part of Psalm 107, with some difference of expression.

13174 It is thus the Septuagint call the Philistines, because they had no affinity with the Israelites; whereas the Edomites were descended from Esau, or Edom, the brother of Jacob, and the Ammonites and Moabites from Lot, the nephew of Abraham. See Psalm 85:4. According to Menochius the meaning of the verse is: I will go to take possession of Edom; for already the Philistines obey me.

13175 All these verses apply very well to the Church militant.

13177 St. Jerome translates: Non timebo. But Bellarmine says that in the Hebrew the terms are here the same as in verse 2: Non movebor.

13178 Many, also, understand thereby the resurrection, either spiritual or eternal, in accordance with the title: Canticum psalmi resurrectionis—A Canticle of the Psalm of the Resurrection.

13180 The following is what we read in regard to verse 5: Quia odio habuerunt me gratis—They have hated me without cause (John, 15:25).—12: Zelus domus tuæ comedit me—The zeal of thy house hath eaten me up (John, 2:17).—26: (John, 19:28).—30: Fiat commoratio eorum deserta, et non sit qui inhabitet in ea—Let their habitation become desolate, and let there be none to dwell therein (Acts, 1:20). The prophet makes Jesus Christ speak through the whole psalm.

13182 In this last part of the psalm, the prophet, always speaking in the person of Jesus Christ, predicts the glory of the Saviour and the establishment of the Church.

13183 That is, which has all the qualities of a choice victim.

13184 "In vasis." See Psalm 7:14. "Sanctus Israel." God was called the Holy One of Israel, because he sanctified the people of Israel with his grace, and that people was to acknowledge and celebrate the sanctity of God with the worship that they rendered to him.

13187 By "Pauperem"—Poor, Bellarmine understands the human race after its fall, despoiled of all its goods, and incapable of help from any creature. By "A potente"—the Powerful, he understands the devil, whose miserable slave man had become.

13190 Gaume has preferred the sense of the Vulgate.

13193 According to Bellarmine and others it is a notice addressed to all men to induce them to lay aside pride in the expectation of God's judgment.

13194 "Populum tuum, filios Jacob et Joseph." The name of Joseph is frequently found in the psalms, with or instead of the name of the Patriarch Jacob, as representing the entire people of God. Several reasons may be given for this: God as well as Jacob, had a particular affection for Joseph, and preferred him to his brethren on account of his virtue; besides, the right of primogeniture, of which Ruben had rendered himself unworthy, was given to the family of Joseph (1 Paral. 6), and in the division of the promised land it formed two tribes instead of one, those of Ephraim and Manasses, whom Jacob (Gen. 43:5) had adopted and raised to the rank of his own sons, in transferring the birthright of Manasses to Ephraim. The tribe of Ephraim was established in the centre, and for a long time it had the privilege of possessing at Silo the Tabernacle with the Ark of the Covenant, as may be seen in the following psalm. Moreover, Bellarmine says (Ps. 79:1) that Joseph, who had fed the people of Israel in Egypt, was looked upon as their chief.

13195 Bellarmine adds here a useful remark: David in mentioning the tribe of Ephraim means all the Israelites; it was the most powerful after the tribe of Juda, and in Scripture most frequently reproaches are addressed to the tribe of Ephraim, and praises to the tribe of Juda. Hence it is that the afflictions of the entire people are represented under the name of Ephraim rather than that of the other tribes; and towards the end of the psalm, v. 73, 74, the tribe of Juda is chosen in preference of that of Ephraim. See the Prophet Osee. Moreover, in the tribe of Ephraim was situated the town of Silo, which for a long time had the privilege of possessing the holy Tabernacle, a favor of which it was afterwards deprived as is related in verse 66. See note to preceding psalm, v. 14.

13197 See notes to verses 12 and 66.

13198 Bellarmine observes that this eulogium is applicable to David only in a limited sense; but it is perfectly verified in him of whom David was the figure, Jesus Christ, the King of future ages and the Good Shepherd of the flock of his faithful.

13199 We remark, in order to better understand the verse, that these are the tribes that have sprung from Rachel. In the desert they walked and camped together, having always the Ark before their eyes; so in the promised land they were grouped towards the centre, and kept the Ark, at first at Silo, in the tribe of Ephraim, and then on the mountain of Sion, in the tribe of Benjamin. Now the holy Ark was adorned with two figures of Cherubim extending their wings upon the propitiatory, where the Lord manifested his presence and rendered his oracles.

13200 To be fed on tears, is to be so afflicted that one can neither eat nor drink.

13202 In fact, the possessions of the Israelites extended on the one side as far as the Mediterranean, and on the other as far as the Euphrates (Exod. 23:31; Deut. 11:24).

13203 "Singularis." This verse properly signifies Solitary, and is here a substantive, as Bellarmine explains it; it is, says Gaume, the name given by hunters to the old wild boar that lives isolated. From Singularis, understood Porcus, comes the Italian Cinghiale, and the French Sanglier.

13204 "Virum dexteræ tuæ." Bellarmine and other interpreters, understand by these words Jesus Christ, whom God formed with his own hand, or by the operation of the Holy Ghost, in the womb of the Blessed Virgin. We may add that he was to take his seat at the right hand of the eternal Father.

13205 They had promised to obey him faithfully: Omnia verba Domini, quæ locutus est, faciemus—We will do all the words of the Lord (Exod. 24:3). "Tempus." According to St. Augustine: Tempus supplicii—Their time of punishment. Bellarmine says that in this and the next verse it is the psalmist who speaks.

13206 It is thus that the Septuagint call the Philistines. According to the Hebrew: Palæstina—the land of the Philistines: Terra Philistinorum (Gen. 21:33). See Psalm 59:9.

13207 Also the Moabites, descendants of Moab, also son of Lot (Gen. 19:37).

13208 It seems to us that we can explain this verse in a more literal manner, namely: Make them like a light wheel or straw, exposed to the wind to be its sport, that is, in such a manner that they are incapable of resisting.

13209 "Montes." That is, according to Menochius and Bossuet: The wooded mountains; which gives simply the ordinary repetition.

13210 Thy land; that is, its inhabitants, or Thy people.

13211 "Justitia de cœlo prospexit." Therefore divine Justice will direct its eyes from the heights of the heavens down upon the earth, to exact from the Man-God due satisfaction and thereby re-establish us in sanctity. Such is the explanation given by Canon Gaume.

13212 See Psalm liii, verse 3.

13213 Superbus in Hebrew Rahab, in Psalm 88:11, and in Isaias 51:9; Pharaoh is designated thereby.

13214 See note to Psalm 82:6. This is especially explained by Bellarmine and Menochius (Ps. 59.).

13215 This text well applies to the beginning of the psalm, as also to verses 9 and 10.

13216 On the subject of these three verses, 11, 12, and 13, one may see the Canticle of Ezechias, verse 13; and Psalm 113:26.

13217 In fact, the prayer of the Saviour was not absolute; for he added: Verumtamen, non sicut ego volo, sed sicut tu—Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt (Matt. 26:39). But the verse adapts itself better to this word that he uttered in his abandonment on the cross: Deus meus! Deus meus! ut quid dereliquisti me?—My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? (Matt. 27:46.)

13219 See Psalm 86:3.

13220 We find the same expressions in Psalm 106:3.

13221 Some interpreters translate the Hebrew in the singular; but St. Jerome translates it in the plural, and Bellarmine says: In græco habetur: "Filiis tuis" sed Sanctus Hieronymus, in Epistola ad Suniam et Fretellam, dicit omnes interpretes vertisse: "Sanctis tuis," ut habetur in hebræo.

13222 Here begins the second part of the psalm: the prophet puts the calamities in juxtaposition with the promises in order to touch the heart of God and obtain mercy.

13224 The beginning of the prayer to hasten the coming of the Messias, and the accomplishment of the divine promises.

13225 This conclusion of the psalm, says Canon Gaume, shows that in the complaints of the prophet there was neither impatience nor murmuring; we see in them an unreserve full of confidence in the wisdom and good pleasure of God.

13226 God has reserved vengeance to himself: Mea est ultio. (Saturday at Lauds, Canticle of Moses, v. 50; or Deut, 32:35.) Mihi vindicta; ego retribuam (Rom. 12:19).

13227 "Superbis." That is: To the proud that refuse to humble themselves to do penance.

13229 The two following psalms refer to the same subject.

13230 See Psalm 103:2.

13231 See Psalm 92:2. We may here understand the creation; this is well expressed by the word Firmavit, or Fundavit (1 Paral. 16:30); but if we apply the verse to the spiritual kingdom of Jesus Christ, and to the reformation of manners accomplished by the evangelical law, the word Correxit suits perfectly.

13232 The following may be the idea of this verse and of the rest of the psalm: The Lord will at first appear enveloped in obscurity, like the sun when hidden by the clouds; yet he will govern all with a sovereign justice which he will manifest by showing himself in his justice at the last day.

13233 Bellarmine explaining the word Sanctum says that it gives us to understand that the work is accomplished, not by the material force of the arm, but by a spiritual force; in fact, Jesus Christ has not crushed the enemy of our salvation by corporal arms or forces, but by his charity, his patience, his humanity, his obedience, the merits of his holy life, the shedding of his precious blood and his death on the cross.

13234 God was regarded as seated on the wings of Cherubim, stretched out over the Propitiatory or Mercy-seat (2 Kings, 6:2). Hence the Ark is called God's foot-stool (1 Par. 28:2). But according to several Fathers, the prophet could also have had in view another holy Ark, another foot-stool of God, yet more worthy of our adoration, namely, the Humanity of Jesus Christ personally united with the Divinity.

13235 For Psalm 91.—Bonum est—which is sometimes said instead of the above, see Saturday at Lauds.

13236 Several interpreters, as Bellarmine, agreeing with the different editions of the breviary which we have been able to see, read this passage without the interrogation, and thus understand the Vulgate: Intelligam in via immaculata, quando venies ad me. That is: I will see and I will follow the pure way when Thou comest to my aid. St. Jerome translates the Hebrew in the same way: Erudiar in via perfecta, quando venies ad me. This version agrees well with the rest of the psalm understood in the future tense; it then expresses a series of good resolutions with the request of the grace necessary to be faithful to them.

13237 The very title of the psalm in the Hebrew as well as in the Greek and the Latin clearly indicates its subject: Oratio pauperis, cum anxius fuerit, et in conspectu Domini effuderit precem suam; Prayer of the poor man when he is in anxiety, and when he pours out his prayer in the presence of the Lord.

13238 The following is another explanation: I have been stricken as grass which is trodden down and dried by the heat of the sun, and my heart is fallen into aridity and desolation, because I neglected to take spiritual nourishment to sustain my soul.

13239 The terms of this last verse suit perfectly the holy Church, which is the city of God, in which a happy people always dwell under the infallible direction of the Vicar of Jesus Christ, until it becomes established in the abode of the eternal beatitude.

13240 Of what and how we are formed.

13241 See Psalm 95.

13242 The psalm seems to refer to the firmament which separates the upper from the lower waters (Gen. 1:6). Gaume says that science has established the existence of these higher waters. See Psalm 148:4.

13243 This verse may be understood of the earth, and signifies that in proportion as the waters retired the mountains seemed to rise up and the valleys to lower themselves; but it may also be understood of the waves, which, pressed by the order of the Most High, rose up like mountains, and lowered themselves like valleys by rolling into the abysses that were prepared for them. Moreover, the Lord said to the sea: Thou shalt come so far, and no farther: Usque huc venies, et non procedes amplius, et hic confrhiges tumentes fluctus tuos—Hitherto thou shalt come, and shalt go no farther, and here thou shalt break thy swelling waves (Job, 38:11).

13244 The first fifteen verses of this psalm form part of the Canticle of David (1 Paral, 16:8–22), but with some differences of expression.

13245 "Laudamini." St. Jerome translates the Hebrew: Exsultate; and Bellarmine: Laudate vos ipsos; which the learned Cardinal thus explains: Congratulate yourselves or glory, not in yourselves or in your virtue, but in this that the holy name of God has been manifested to you, according to the advice of the Apostle: Qui gloriatur, in Domino glorietur—He that glorieth, may glory in the Lord (1 Cor. 1:31). In Paralipomenon we read simply: Laudate nomen sanctum ejus—Praise ye his holy name (1 Par. 16:10).

13246 Seek always his face. "Faciem ejus." That is, his benevolent looks, his favor, his grace, by avoiding all that may displease him, and by doing what is agreeable to him.

13247 "Servi . . . Electi," According to the Greek, these words are in the plural.

13248 The promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob may be seen in Gen. 12:7, 13:15, 17:7, 26:3, 28:13. On the word "Funiculum," see Psalm 77:60.

13249 Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, called Christs, or Anointed, and Prophets, because they were specially consecrated to the service of God, exercised the functions of the priesthood, and foretold the future (Gen. 20:7, 27:46).

13250 "Firmamentum." According to the Hebrew: Baculum—the Staff, as we read in Leviticus: Postquam confregero baculum panis vestri—After I have broken the staff of your bread (Lev. 26:26).

13251 St. Jerome translates as it is in the Greek: Sibi. The fact is, as Moses brought forward difficulties, God gave him his brother as an assistant (Exod. 4:15).

13252 St. Jerome translates: Non fuerunt increduli verbis ejus—They were not incredulous as to his words. Here is another interpretation adopted by many: He (God) did not belie his words. According to the Greek, we have Quia instead of Et non; literal translation: Quia exacerbaverunt sermones ejus. We must remark that the psalmist does not try to recall all the plagues of Egypt, nor to follow the historical order, as in Exodus 7.; darkness was a new plague. See Psalm 77:49–56.

13254 For this verse and the preceding see Psalm 77:18, and the following verses. The last verses sum up the benefits of God, according to promise, and the obligations of his people.

13255 "Omnes laudes ejus." All the praises that he merits for the marvels of his goodness, mercy, power, wisdom, etc. The psalm begins by acknowledging that his subject is above his strength.

13256 It is by this means that the Lord is deservedly praised. Rectos decet collaudatio—Praise becometh the upright (Ps. 22:1). Petition for this grace in the two following verses.

13257 In the Greek version the plural is used as it is in Latin. Bellarmine explains and conciliates well the two numbers by saying that it is the people who speak, or the psalmist in the name of the people; this can be expressed in the plural as well as in the singular. In these few words he asks for the election or predestination, justification, or glorification, which are the principle, the means, and the end of eternal beatitude in order that God may be praised there in a perfect manner. We may remark that the rest of the psalm is found in the plural, even in the Hebrew: Peccavimus, etc.

13258 "Concupierunt concupiscentiam." Bossuet explains this by saying: Vehementissime concupiverunt cibos. See Psalm 77, verse 20, and the following verses.

13259 "Gloriam suam." Bellarmine. Menochius, Carrières, Gaume, etc., thus explain: The true God who was, or was contributory to, their glory. It seems to us that the psalmist explains clearly enough the following verse: Deum qui salvabit eos . . . The God who wrought so many wonders to save them.

13260 This example, as Bellarmine and St. Augustine remark, shows the great power of the intercession of the saints with God; and, surely, without the continual prayers of the servants of God the world would not continue long.

13262 See Psalm 80:7.

13263 We may see in regard to this and the following verses the Book of Judges.

13265 "In iniquitatibus suis." St. Jerome translates: Propter iniquitatem suam. Menochius: Propter iniquitates suas. Carrières and Gaume give the same sense: Because of their iniquities.

13266 Others translate: He showed his mercy towards them in the sight of all those, etc. Such is the meaning which St. Augustine and Bellarmine regard as the most probable.

13267 The psalmist begins by an invitation to praise the goodness and the mercy of God. He then describes four examples of recourse to the Lord in affliction, and at the end of each repeats his invitation: see verses 6–8, 13–15, 19–21, and 28–31. He concludes by an eulogium and a prophecy of the all-powerful and ever-merciful Providence of the Most High towards his servants, or his Church.

13268 See Psalm 88:12.

13269 Such is the literal sense of these verses, 4 to 7; but the history of the Israelites is here an example of what happens to all men, people or individuals. So it is understood by Bellarmine.

13270 "Umbra mortis." See Psalm 43:21.

13271 "Tuus. Domine, sermo, qui sanat omnia—Thy word, O Lord, which healeth all things (Wis. 16:12). In the most exalted sense we may understand the mission of the Incarnate Word. Word consubstantial with the external Father, sent to heal the human race of the wounds inflicted by sin.

13273 These two verses, 39, 40, well apply to the reprobation of the obstinate Jews, and the two following to the vocation of the Gentiles.

13275 These are the Philistines. See Psalm 86:4.

13276 It is Jesus Christ that speaks: He said: Clarifica me tu, Pater—Glorify Thou me, O Father! (John, 17:5.) Among the Jews some attacked him openly, as when they called him Beelzebub (Matt. 10:25); others sought to surprise him, as when they said: Magister, scimus quia verax es—Master, we know that Thou art a true speaker (Matt. 22:16). Judas was to betray him with a kiss; and all were about to overwhelm him with outrages, while declaring him worthy of death.

13277 We may add that since that time the Jews have had no High Priest.

13279 The word opus is used in the sense of wages: Non morabitur opus mercenarii tui apud te usque mane—The wages of him that hath been hired by thee shall not abide with thee until the morning (Lev, 19:13).

13280 Title of the psalm: Laus cantici ipsi David, in die ante Sabbatum, quando fundata est terra—Praise in the way of a canticle, for David himself, on the day before the Sabbath, when the earth was founded. By this we see that formerly this psalm was sung on the eve of the Sabbath, the day on which the work of creation was completed by the formation of man, whose dominion the earth was to be. On this same day the earth was renewed and restored by the Passion of our divine Saviour, to which mystery interpreters likewise apply this psalm; but the Church sings it at daybreak on Sunday, at Lauds, because if Jesus Christ redeemed the world by his Passion and death on the eve of the Sabbath, it was at the earliest dawn of Sunday that he took possession of his kingdom by his glorious resurrection: Dominus regnavit, etc. A song of triumph, which, placed at the beginning, characterizes perfectly the entire Office.

13281 We may remark that in the text the comparative is understood; this renders the expression stronger and more suitable. The expression signifies that in regard to Him who is spoken of no comparison is possible.

13282 Or else: My soul desires Thee ardently as its food and its drink, its light, and its joy. Even my body sighs after Thee on account of its numberless necessities and many miseries, which Thou only canst remedy.

13283 "Dedit." The past instead of the future, according to the custom of the prophets. "Fructum suum." Its fruit by excellence beyond all comparison. See Psalm 84:13; also the text of Isaias: Erit germen Domini in magnificentia et gloria, et Fructus terræ sublimis—The bud of the Lord shall be in magnificence, and glory, and the fruit of the earth shall be high (Is. 4:2).

13285 However, as the present work is not only an explanation, but also, according to its title, a translation (see the Dedication) for the use of persons who do not understand Latin, we have deemed it expedient to furnish also a translation of this admirable canticle. It is abridged from the one found in the prophet Daniel, which consists of thirty-eight verses. In it the three young martyrs, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, call first (v. 1) upon all creatures in general, animate and inanimate, to bless the Lord; then (verses 2 to 14) they address themselves to the several kinds of creatures in particular, beginning with the angels of heaven above and descending by degrees down to earth; then (verses 15–17) they encourage all the servants of God, and lastly (v. 18) their own selves, to praise him. The two last verses have been added by the Holy Church; but the last being formed from the verses 52 and 56 of Daniel.—Remarks: Verse 3. "Aquæ omnes quæ super cælos sunt." See next psalm, verse 4. "Virtutem Domini." This expression is variously understood; it seems to denote the angelic hosts charged with executing the intimations of God's will throughout the universe. See Psalm 102. v. 22, and next psalm, 5:2. Verse 5. "Spiritus Dei." The winds. Verse 6. "Frigus est æstus." Some understand hereby winter and summer.

13286 Bellarmine, who holds the second opinion with the holy Fathers, seems to us to refute in a solid way this last opinion; besides, we see that the psalm is divided into two parts, the first of which refers to the higher regions of the heavens. See, moreover, in the preceding canticle, verse 3, and in Psalm 103, verse 3.

13287 Reference is here made to the last judgment. We may remark a striking relation between the next verse and the words of our Lord: Ligatis manibus et pedibus ejus, mittite eum in tenebras exteriores—Bind his hands and feet, and cast him into the exterior darkness.

13288 This psalm is, as it were, the conclusion of the two preceding psalms and of the whole psalter.

13290 This part of the verse is cited by St. Paul (Rom. 3:4).

13292 "Sanguinibus." The plural instead of the singular, a Hebraism, to denote the abundance of the blood shed, and the enormity of the crime. Besides Urias, David had caused a considerable number of his bravest soldiers to be destroyed (2 Kings, 9:13). In praying to God to deliver us from remorse, we should ask him not to take away the remembrance of our faults, but in his goodness to deign to repair the evil that we have done, and even to change it into good, as happened to the royal penitent.

13293 The last two verses apply very well to the spiritual Jerusalem in which the true sacrifice of justice was to be offered, which alone could fully satisfy divine justice, and of which the ancient sacrifices were a figure.

One cannot meditate too much on this psalm. which is an admirable and a salutary prayer, filled with light and unction, and which one never grows weary in repeating. We remark at least the motives invoked by the prophet to touch the heart of God and to obtain his grace, a grace that is perfect, that is, the remission of his sins, v. 2; a pure heart and a light spirit, v. 3, 8, 10, 11, with a holy joy, companion of innocence, v. 9, 13; and the gift of perseverance, v. 12, 13; the first motive, the divine mercy and goodness, v. 1. 2; the second, the knowledge that he had of his sad state, and the sorrow that he felt, v. 4; the third, his avowal and the promise of pardon, v. 5; the fourth, the misery of his nature in consequence of original sin, v. 6; the fifth, the sincerity of his soul, v. 7; the sixth, his good resolutions, and the good that he could do to others, v. 14, 15, 16; finally, the seventh, his contrite and humbled heart disposed to make every sacrifice, v. 17 and the following verses.

13294 "Videbo" According to the Hebrew: Contemplabor; which gives to the verse the following meaning: Every morning I will place myself in Thy presence, and I will contemplate, or will consider, will meditate on—what subject? that you repel all those that give themselves up to sin, v. 5, either in action, or in word, v. 6, or in sentiments, desires, thoughts, v. 7.

13295 Our divine Saviour himself employed this figure of the water when speaking of the spiritual goods that he brought into the world (John, 4:13; 7:38). And he has chosen water as the matter of the sacrament of baptism. Moreover, St. Paul says that the rock from which Moses made water flow represented Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 10:4).

13297 This is an abridgment of psalm 41, page 132.

13298 4:5. "Ad altare Dei . . . Confitebor tibi in cithara." Bellarmine says that the prophet thus designates the sacrifice of praise which is offered to God in the eternal tabernacles, and which agrees with what we read in the Apocalypse: Habentes singuli citharas—Having every one of them harps (5:8). Et vocem quam audivi, sicut citharœdorum citharizantium in citharis suis—And the voice which I heard was as the voice of harpers, harping on their harps (14:2).

13299 Ezechias was then thirty-nine years old (4 Kings, 18:2; 10:6).

13300 As Ezechias had as yet no child, it grieved him to think that the promised Messias would not be in his line. However, according to the Hebrew the word Generatio means here: Vita, ætas, tempus vitæ—Life, age, time of life; hence the words are more commonly interpreted: My life has been taken away.

13301 That is: Give security for me by undertaking my defence, and by protecting me from the evil that oppresses me like a tyrant.—After these complaints the sick man opens his eyes, and recognizes the hand of God justly striking him; then he humbles himself, confessing his faults, and the Lord with the pardon restores to him his health by prolonging his life for fifteen years.

13302 For there is the holy place that Thou Thyself hast chosen for Thy abode among us and for the seat of Thy worship.—For a greater reason if we apply this verse to the heavenly Jerusalem as in the Office of the Dead.

13303 "Vespere." In the Greek this is the genitive case.

13304 "Flumen Dei." That is, according to Bellarmine: The various courses of the water, which are God's work.

13305 "Rivos." According to the Hebrew: Sulcos. Thus it is translated by St. Jerome.

13306 "Donec." According to the Greek: Quia—Because.—In this passage, v. 6 to 12, we perceive several figures found also in psalm 112. and in the canticle Magnificat.

(For the psalm Laudate Dominum de cœlis, see Sunday at Lauds.)

13307 "According to its title: Oratio Moysi, hominis Dei—A prayer for Moses, the man of God. Many with St. Athanasius (Ep. ad Marcell). and St. Jerome (Ep. ad Cypr.) think that these words are to be understood literally, and consequently that Moses is the author of the psalm. Bellarmine combats this opinion. Bossuet defends it.

13308 "Deus." Bellarmine thinks that this word is in the vocative case, which gives it more energy and expression; he notes also the force of the present tense: "Tu es" as showing the eternity of God, without past or future.

(The psalms Deus, Deus meus, and Deus misereatur, as on Sunday at Lauds.)

13309 "Aranea." As a spider. The Septuagint added this word, and have thus modified the comparison.—"Dies annorum nostrorum in ipsis." A Hebrew turn, observes Bellarmine, for saying: In diebus annorum nostrorum.

13310 "Quoniam." That is to say: Verumtamen or Certe—However or certainly.—"Supervenit." According to the Greek it is the past tense.

13311 This verse and the following may be extended to the past tense, as we find them in the Vulgate; but in the beginning we must supply these words: Make that we may be able to say: We have heen, etc.—The translation of St. Jerome is clearer: Imple nos matutina misericordia tua, et laudabimus et Lætabimur in cunctis diebus nostris Lætifica nos pro diebus quibus afflixisti nos, et annis in quibus vidimus mala—Fill us in the morning with Thy mercy, and we shall give praise and rejoice all our days. Gladden us for the days wherein Thou hast afflicted us, and for the years in which we have seen evils.

13313 "Ascensorem." Pharao, and with him his whole army, as we see in verses 4 to 21.

13314 "Et factus est." That is, according to Cornelius: Nam, or Quia factus est.

13315 Projecit." According to the Hebrew: Ejaculatus est—He hurled them with as much ease as an archer hurls an arrow.

13316 "In fortibus." According to the Hebrew and Greek: In diis—Among the gods of the heathen.

13317 "Ascenderunt populi, et irati sunt." According to the Hebrew: Audierunt populi, et fremuerunt. It seems to us that the two versions may be reconciled in the following manner: The inhabitants of the country have heard it said that the Israelites were approaching; they ran to the heights to see, and they trembled with anger.

13318 However, among the interpreters whom we have been able to consult, we have found none that shares the opinion of Father Lallemant.

13319 Plantabis." As to this expression, see Psalm 43:3. The prophet uses this and the preceding verb in the future; but he then uses the past tense: Operatus es, Firmaverunt, though everything refers to the future.

13320 The simplicity of this summary contrasts strikingly with the grandeur of the canticle of which it retraces the first subject.

(The other psalms, as well as the Benedictus, as on Sunday at Lauds.)

13321 Title of the Psalm: Psalmus David, quando persequebatur eum Absalom, filius ejus—A psalm of David when his son Ahsalom pursued him (2 Kings, 17.).

13323 Bossuet says of this canticle: Ut magnificentissime, ita obscurissime canit.

13326 According to Cornelius, the prophet celebrates in this canticle the wonders that God wrought in delivering the Israelites from slavery in Egypt, because these wonders represented those that were to be worked in the deliverance of the Jews from Bahylon. Now, these two deliverances prefigured the mystery of the redemption of souls, which the prophet had chiefly in view. Then, in verse 24, he takes up and develops what he said in the beginning, namely, the grief that he felt at the sight of the evils that were to fall upon the people of Israel; but he concludes, verse 30, by putting confidence in the Lord who was to save this same people in the person of whom he speaks.

13327 Title of the psalm: Psalmus cantici in die Sabbati—A psalm of a canticle on the Sabbath day. According to Bellarmine, this title signifies that the psalm was composed to be sung on the Sahbath, in order to teach the people that they should praise God on that day, especially for his creating and governing the world.

13329 "Mane misericordiam tuam: et veritatem tuam per noctem." We believe that here by the morning, or the day, and by the night we must understand the time of prosperity and the time of adversity: in prosperity we should acknowledge the benefits that we owe to the goodness and mercy of God; in adversity, we should remember the goods that he promises to those that remain faithful to him or who are converted, and who count with certainty and confidence on his faithfulness in keeping all his promises.

13331 Bellarmine explains: Planted in the Church of God by true faith, watered by the waters of the grace of the sacraments, rooted in and based on charity, they do not cease to produce flowers and fruits by holy aspirations and good works.

13332 The following are the words that the Lord addressed to Moses: Scribite vobis canticum istud, et docete filios Israel; ut memoriter teneant et ore decantent; et sit mihi carmen istud pro

testimonio inter filios Israel: Write you this canticle, and teach the children of Israel: that they may know it by heart and sing it by mouth; and this song may be unto me for a testimony among the children of Israel. That is, in order that they may by this means constantly recall what I am, my goodness towards them, their ingratitude, their unfaithfulness, what they may expect in future, my justice and my mercy.

13333 Their vine, or their nation, which was a choice vine, the vine of the Saviour. See Psalm 79:9.

13334 See Psalm 93:1.

13335 We read in the title: Cum venissent Ziphæi, et dixissent ad Saul: Nonne David absconditus est apud nos?—When the men of Ziph had come, and said to Saul: Is not David hidden with us? (1 Kings 23:19.) This psalm refers to the danger to which David was exposed when he hid himself in the desert of Ziph.

13336 See Psalm 85:13.

13337 Ordinary prediction under the form of prayer.

13338 Many give this interpretation: By drawing me out of distress, and placing me at ease in perfect liberty.

13339 This verse, says Bellarmine, expresses the cries of joy and of salutation uttered by the just.

13340 We add that the Saviour applied to himself this and the next verse (Matt. 21:42).

13341 This day, as the Office of Easter attests and in which this verse is frequently repeated, is the day of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, when having been rejected by the Jews in his Passion, he was established and recognized as the Corner-stone of the great edifice of the universal Church. According to Bellarmine, the following verse is joined to this, as if it were: Let us then rejoice, saying: O Domine, etc.

13342 After having predicted the advent and the triumph of the Messias, the prophet in the two verses exhorts the faithful people to render to God solemn thanksgiving for such a benefit. Then in vs. 27 and 28, repetition of v. 20, he himself expresses his gratitude to the Lord; he finally concludes as admirably as he began.

13343 Many think that there is question here of Mount Sion, and that this psalm was composed for the translation of the Ark; but according to Bellarmine, this opinion does not appear to rest on any solid foundation. After having said that all men have their habitation on earth, the prophet asks who are those that will be admitted to the heavenly abode.

13344 This verse is a summary of spiritual perfection: Exemption from every evil, either exterior or interior; good use of talents received; fidelity to God and also to our neighbor. Such are the qualities of our divine model; this should be the same with all those that wish to follow him: "Quæreutium eum;" hence they shall enter with him into glory on the day of triumph, as has been partly seen at his ascension, and as will be seen in a complete manner after the last judgment; then all the elect with body and soul, shall make their triumphant entrance into the happy city, following the King of Glory.—See Psalm 14.

13346 Twofold explanation of what we read in the preceding verse: Legem dabit delinquentibus. The prophet says, as Bellarmine remarks, that this is not understood of all sinners, but only of those that are humble and meek, submissive to the divine teachings, and well disposed to receive them. He still rests upon this explanation in the following verse.

13347 This verse is obscure. According to Menochius, the first part is not interrogative but is expressive of admiration, as if it were said: How happy is the man that fears the Lord! The prophet then describes in this same verse and in the following verses the happiness of him who fears God.

13348 See the preceding psalm, 5:5 and 11.

13349 "Cum concilio vanitatis." Bellarmine with Theodoret thinks that here there is question of the worship of idols.

13350 The prophet has just said what he abhors and what he desires to flee from; he now speaks of what he loves and what he wishes to practise so as to be preserved from the misfortune of the wicked and to share in the felicity of the saints.

13351 In the same mystical sense by "Baculus" is understood the cross, which was the instrument of our salvation. Here ends the allegory of the shepherd and the sheep.

13353 "Verba delictorum meorum." According to Bellarmine and Menochius this is a Hebraism for Delicta mea.

13354 "Et non ad insipientiam mihi." St. Jerome translates: Nec est silentium mihi. This verse, which is interpreted in many various ways, we prefer to interpret thus: I will invoke Thee during my life, so that this chalice, this cruel death, may move away from me, and Thou wilt not hear me; but I will invoke Thee after my death so that Thou mayest resuscitate me, and then Thou wilt not keep silence in my regard, but wilt hear me.

13355 "Vult eum." A Hebraism, say the interpreters, for Amat eum. This then signifies: If it is true that God is with him, as he assures us.

13357 "Vituli." There are some that understand by this the men of the people.

13360 This holy law is designated almost in every verse of this psalm under various names, which express its different characteristics; these names are: Eloquium, repeated five times; Eloquia, four times; Judicium, twice; Judicia, thirteen times; Justificationes, twenty-eight times; Lex, twenty-seven times; Mandatum, twice; Mandata, thirty-six times; Sermones, four times; Testimonia, twenty-two times; Verbum, once; Verba, four times; Veritas, once; Via, once; Viæ, three times. It is noteworthy that several of these words are employed here and there in the sense of a Promise, namely: Eloquium, ten times; Eloquia, once; Judicim, twice; Sermones, once; Verbum, seven times; Verba, once. They refer to the promises of help or of reward, and this also relates to the fulfilment of the law.

13362 "Judicia justitiæ tuæ." The sentences, decrees, the rules of conduct that Thou hast established according to Thy justice. In this verse and the three following verses the prophet expresses his affection for the law of God; it is always in his mouth, in his will, in his intelligence, and in his memory.

13363 Desire and petition for persevering in fervor. In verses 17 to 32 the prophet makes us ask for the grace to avoid or to overcome what hinders us from practising well the law of God; namely, the death of the soul, the passions that make one blind, the dangers of the world, tepidity, pride, the devil, human respect, earthly affections, ignorance, tediousness, discouragement, sadness.

13364 Or, "Vivifica me secundum verbum tuum" Make me live conformably to Thy law.

13365 "Statue" Render firm and stable. This is a request for the gift of perseverance. We may remark that the same prayers under different forms are reproduced here and there in the course of the psalm.

13366 Promises of recompense for those that observe Thy Law.

13367 We remark here that the word Judicium or Judicia in this psalm can be understood of three ways that are linked together, namely, of the law itself as in verses 7, 13. etc., of the judgment that will be pronounced on the observance of this law; or of the recompense or chastisement that will be merited.

13369 All is just and true: they will not fail to realize their promises and their menaces. The same expression as in verses 142 and 151.

13371 "Quomodo?" St. Jerome translates: Quam! And Bellarmine explains: Quam vehementer! Hence this other interpretation of the verse: Oh, how I love Thy law! it is unceasingly the subject of my meditation.

13372 We may understand this verse in this sense: Receive with kindness the promise that I make Thee with a good heart that I will observe Thy law (v. 106), and aid me with Thy grace to keep it faithfully.

13373 St. Jerome renders it: Propter æternam retributionem—Because of the eternal reward. This reward is chiefly the possession of God himself as he said to Abraham: Ego . . . merces tua magna nimis—I am . . . thy reward exceeding great (Gen. 15:1). See, moreover, Psalm 15:5; 72:24, 25. The whole law is the love of God; now love seeks and wishes only the object loved.

13374 "Vivam." I shall then live a true life. There are some that believe this verb to be in the subjunctive mood, and thus translate the word: Make me live. See the same expression in verses 77 and 144.

13376 "Attraxi spiritum." Literally, I inhaled the air, or drew in my breath, that is, I sighed deeply; a figure that expresses an ardent desire.

13378 We can compare this with verse 7 of Psalm 11, and with what Moses has said in speaking of the apparition of God on Mount Sinai: In dextra ejus ignea lex—In his right hand a fiery law (Deut. 33:2). The law of God can be called thus, because as fire it illumines, purifies, and inflames by producing in souls divine love. See also Psalm 18.

13379 St. Jerome translates: Parvulus sum ego, et contemptibilis; sed præcepta tua non sum oblitus. That is, in our opinion: I am small and miserable; but if I observe well Thy law, I shall be tall and rich, as much as it is possible for one to be so. See verses 14, 22, and 162.

13380 To love the law of God is to love God himself, and nothing can hurt those that really possess this holy love; on the other hand, everything contributes to their greater good: Diligentibus Deum, omnia cooperantur in bonum—To them that love God all things work together unto good (Rom. 8:28). This twenty-first stanza of eight verses, 161 to 168, expresses the sentiments of a soul established in perfection.

13381 The prophet makes us finish this great psalm by an humble and a fervent prayer, in order to obtain the grace faithfully to observe the divine law, and so to attain our eternal salvation.

13383 In the first four verses the prophet has described the royalty of the Messias; in the following verse he announces what will be his priesthood.

13385 According to St. Augustine, the prophet contemplating Jesus Christ after his ascension addressed to the eternal Father the words of this verse; he says: The Lord who is sitting at Thy right will overthrow those that wish to oppose his reign or his Church upon earth. Bellarmine prefers this explanation as easier and more natural.

13388 Fidelity in the fulfilment of the promises made to his servants; justice in the judgment that condemns the Chananeans to be despoiled in punishment of their crimes.

13389 We may here remark the composition of the psalm in order to understand it well: After the first verse, which announces the subject, the prophet praises the works of God in general, v. 2, 3; then his benefits towards the typical people, v. 4, 5, 6; the excellence and the stability of his law, v. 7; and finally, the sending of the divine Redeemer giving salvation to the world: the last two verses form a practical conclusion, indicating the way to be followed to profit by these graces.

13390 In the Hebrew text this psalm has the same form as the preceding. We may distinguish in it three parts: 1. Happiness of the just man, because of his love for God; 2 (verses 5 to 8). Happiness of the just man, because of his love for his neighbor; 3. Unhappiness of the sinner.

13391 The prophet began by saying that God deserves to be praised in every place and at all times on account of his greatness and power; he here shows us that we should praise him most especially with thanksgiving for his goodness and wonderful Providence in behalf of all his creatures.

13392 "Barbaro." That is: Speaking another language not understood (1 Cor. 14:11). "Facta est Judæa." According to the Hebrew: Factus est Judas. Juda or the Jewish people. "Ejus." That is: Dei. We may also understand the second verse in this sense: God chose the land of Judæa, there to establish his sanctuary, or his Temple or worship; and chose the people of Israel to exercise or represent his power on earth.

13393 We think that the two ideas may be thus reconciled: The waters that flee represent sinners; the mountains that exult represent the just; the manifestations of the presence of God terrify some and delight others.

13394 Prediction under the form of an imprecation. This may also signify that these unfortunate beings by their culpable blindness render themselves worthy of a like chastisement.

13395 The true God whom we adore, very different from the false divinities whose vanity is described in verses 12 to 16, is also as good and merciful as he is powerful; he does not cease to sustain, to favor, and to protect efficaciously his faithful servants, verses 17 to 22.

13396 The just soul, after the present life, continues to love and to praise God, and does so even in a more perfect manner, but its works are no longer meritorious. See Canticle of Ezechias, v. 13.

13397 A canticle simple, sublime, and admirable, says Gaume, giving expression to Mary's sentiments, and showing the divine plan for the salvation of the world.

13398 The Church herself seems to indicate this sense in the antiphon in which we read: Quia ancillam humilem respexit Deus—Because God hath regarded the humble handmaid. There are, however, interpreters that understand and explain the word Humilitatem in the sense of the virtue of huminty.

13399 "Qui potens est, et sanctum nomen ejus et misericordia ejus . . ." That is: Qui potens est, et sanctus, et misericors—Who is mighty, and holy, and merciful. In the marvellous work wrought by Mary, God has shown forth his power, his sanctity, and his mercy: his power, by making her become Mothe r, and the Mother of the Word incarnate without ceasing to be a Virgin; his sanctity, by raising her to all the perfection that such a dignity required; his mercy, which he has extended through her to all the faithful and to all repentant sinners of every age, so that it is through her as a channel that we receive all graces. Then, verses 6, 7, 8, God has also manifested his power, on the one hand, in his justice in regard to the proud and the rich of the world, his enemies, and on the other hand, in his goodness towards the humble and the poor. And, verses 9, 10, he has also manifested his mercy, at first in the promises made to his servants, and, finally, in his faithfulness in accomplishing them.

13400 This in the Hebrew text is joined to the foregoing psalm

13401 Mercy has reference to the Jews and the Gentiles; but the faithfulness of the Lord does not properly regard only the Jews to whom alone his promises were made.

13404 We have several traits to remark in this beautiful description of the care of divine Providence in regard to the faithful man that confides in his goodness. It not only watches his feet, v. 3, to preserve him from falls and false steps, but it extends its attention to his whole person. In verse 5: "Protectio tua." According to the Hebrew, after Bellarmine: Umbraculum tuum. That is: God is to his servant as a portable pavilion or a shield resting on his hand, and always ready to protect him against all that may be hurtful to him, the dangers of the day and of the night, v. 6, or of prosperity and of adversity, the enemies that attack openly and those that remain hidden. See Psalm 90:5. 4 to 6. In verse 8: "Introitum tuum et exitum tuum." The coming in and the going out, or the beginning and the end of every action, of every undertaking, of every day of our whole life. According to the Hebrew, as St. Jerome translates it, it is in an inverse order: Exitum tuum et introitum tuum; this applies especially to the departure from the land of exile and to the entrance into our country.

13407 There are some that explain this verse differently: Grant that we return from exile in full numbers and with speed, as a current that carries everything with it when under the influence of the South wind.

13408 The holy souls, fruit of the Passion of Jesus Christ, and children of the Church, always persecuted as their divine Spouse, are the arms that the Almighty employs to combat and to overcome the errors and bad passions of the world.

13409 It is known that among the Orientals it was there that judgments were rendered in the presence of the people assembled. See Psalm 68:15.

13412 Beginning similar to that of Psalm 123. "Expugnaverunt." According to the Hebrew and the Greek. Bellarmine says: Angustiaverunt, Bellaverunt. We easily recognize here in the people of Israel the Church militant of all times.

13414 The psalm here enters a second part. repentant sinners are exhorted never to cease to hope in God, because he is full of mercy and faithful to his promises; he himself works out their redemption, and delivers them from all their sins.

13415 In reciting it let us represent to ourselves that we should be the temple of the Holy Ghost, a sanctuary where Jesus Christ, through holy Communion, comes to live in person with the Holy Trinity. Represent to ourselves also the promises that we have made to God and those that God has deigned to make to us.

13416 "Si introiero . . ." Formula of oath. See Psalm 88:35.

13417 The psalmist rneans that the Ark had no proper and fixed abode; it had been three hundred and twenty-eight years in Ephrata, that is, at Silo, in the land of Ephraim; it was afterwards, for seventy years (1 Kings, 7.), at Cariathiarim, a name that signifies City of Forests, after having been seven months with the Philistines; and before being transported (2 Kings, 6.) to Mount Sion it was for three months at the house of Obededom, near Jerusalem.

13418 Christ, or the Anointed, that is, King Salomon: who, after having asked for the ministers of the sanctuary interior and exterior sanctity, now prays for himself by confiding in the merits of his father and in the promises that God made to him,—promises that he calls to mind till the end of the psalm, as he calls to mind at the beginning the promise of David.

13419 All these divine promises are absolute in reference to Jesus Christ and his Church, but not in reference to what concerns the other children of David and his temporal kingdom.

13420 The sense of this double comparison: Fraternal union is agreeable and useful to all those that have the happiness to share in it; it is agreeable, as the most precious perfume, such as is used at the consecration of bishops; it is useful, as the dew that descends upon arid hills to fertilize them. We believe that by Mount Sion must here be understood not that of Jerusalem, but that which is beyond the Jordan near Hermon (Deut. 4:48); and in the Hebrew we find the plural: the mountains of Sion. The Holy Ghost shows us in these images how the heavenly favors and blessings are poured out on the assembly of the faithful, that is, the Church, the members of which are united. 1. At the consecration of a bishop the holy oil, which is a figure of grace, flows from the head to the beard, according to Bellarmine, and from the beard to the vestment: the head is the chief prelate; the beard, according to Bellarmine, are the prelates; the vestment is the faithful. 2. In the same way, the dew that descends from heaven to fertilize the earth extends from the high mountain of Hermon to the hills that surround it.

13421 See the canticle of Moses, v. 52 (Saturday at Lauds).

13422 We may see the same description in Psalm 113:12–16.

13424 Or: The God of all those that are called gods by any title whatsoever. See Psalms 49. and 81.

13425 The prodigies of the power, wisdom, goodness, and mercy of the Lord, enumerated in this psalm, should represent to our mind those of a higher order, such as the divine law, the Redemption, the Eucharist, the Church. We notice that the last two verses reproduce the beginning for the conclusion.

13428 This whole psalm seems to us to apply very well to Jesus Christ speaking in his own person and in that of his rnystical body, as in Psalm 39. We may compare with it the prayer of our divine Saviour after the last supper (John, 17.). It is no doubt in this sense that we recite it at the Vespers of the feast of the Most Holy Redeemer and of the feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

13429 "Sanctum." According to the Greek, this word should be taken as a substantive, and according to the Hebrew, we should have: Verbum. So that we should read: Magnificasti, super omne nomen, sanctum tuum, or Verbum tuum; and translate: Thou hast raised Thy saint or Thy incarnate Word above every name, or above every one that bears Thy name. An interpretation that seems to agree well with the text of the Apostle: Donavit illi nomen quod est super omne nomen—God hath given him a name which is above all names (Phil. 2:9).

13431 "Quia non est sermo in lingua mea." Bellarmine says that here should be supplied: Quem tu non prævideris—Which Thou hast not foreseen. Hence it means: For my tongue does not utter any word that Thou hast not foreseen. Thou knowest them, v. 2, 3, all my thoughts, all my words, all my actions.

13432 "Posuisti super me manum tuam." That is, according to Bellarmine: After having formed me, Thou didst not abandon me; but Thou hast placed and constantly keep Thy hand upon me, to lead, protect, and preserve me; without which I should have fallen back into nothingness.

13434 "In perfectum menm" St. Jerome translates: Informem adhuc me. The second and the third part of the verse are very obscure, and they give occasion to very different interpretations.

13435 What the psalmist said in the beginning God had done in his behalf, he begs him in concluding to do always till he arrived at the object of all his desires.

13436 Such is, says Bellarmine, the opinion of Theodoret, followed by more modern interpreters; but according to the ancient Fathers, St. Hilary, St. Jerome, St. John Chrysostom, St. Augustine, this psalm is a prayer of the mystical body of Jesus Christ against the devil and his agents. It is without doubt in this sense that the Church recites them in the Vespers of the three days of the Holy Week, as also in the Office of the Commemoration of the Passion and in that of the Five Wounds.

13437 The psalmist predicts in this verse, joined to the two following, the eternal loss of the wicked, and in the last two the eternal happiness of the just.

13438 The same subject as in the preceding psalm. It is still, according to Bellarmine and other interpreters, the society of the faithful, or each one of its members, that speak. Here is what the Holy Ghost makes us ask of God: the grace of praying well, v. 2; discretion in our words, v. 3; simplicity of heart, v. 4; finally, flight from bad companions and association with virtuous persons.

13439 Incense was to be burnt twice a day, morning and evening, before the Lord on the altar of incense (Exod. 30:7). Likewise two lambs were to be offered, one in the morning, and one in the evening (Exod. 39:38).

13441 Title of the psalm: Intellectus David, Cum esset in spelunca, oratio—Of understanding for David; a prayer when he was in the cave. Some think that there is here question of the Grotto of Odolla, others of that of Engaddi (1 kings, 22 and 24). The whole psalm well applies to David, but much better to Him of whom he was a figure; and it is this sense that the prophet seems to us to have chiefly in view: first, v. 1–4, we recognize our Lord in his agony in the Garden of Olives; then, v. 5–9, we see him in the hands of his enemies, betrayed, abandoned, denied by his friends; finally, v. 10, he is in the tomb surrounded by a guard, awaiting his resurrection.

13442 The friend, or he that comes to our assistance, that protects, is regarded as placed on the right: Dexter: Propitious, favorable.

13443 The title of the psalm is: Psalmus David adversus Goliath—A psalm of David against Goliath. Under these figures we may see with the holy Fathers Jesus Christ and his Church triumphing over the devil and his agents, and also the just man fighting against his spiritual enemies, interior and exterior.

13444 The shadow has no consistency; it changes and is dissipated without leaving any trace; such is the life of man upon earth, such is man himself (Job, 14:2). And still God has had the goodness to make something great of him; see Psalm 8:5. We may compare this with what is said in Psalm 38:7.

13445 We may see, for these figurative expressions, Psalms 17:11, and 103:33.

13446 "Filiorum alienorum." That is: A foreign race, or the Philistines, who are called Alienigenæ. See Psalm 82:6.

13448 This verse is not found in the present Hebrew text. Bellarmine and Bossuet see in this omission an evident proof of the alteration of that text.

13449 It is from the liberality of God that all the goods that we enjoy in this life come—not only food, as is said in the preceding verse, but also clothing, etc., and he gives them in abundance to all living beings. See Psalm 103.

13450 Even Moses has said: Non est alia natio tam grandis, quæ habeat deos appropinquantes sibi, sieut Dens noster adest cunctis obsecrationibus nostris—Neither is there any other nation so great, that hath gods so nigh them, as our God is present to all our petitions (Dent. 4:7). "In veritate." This expression includes all the conditions that our prayer should have in order to be heard.

13451 Frailty of human support, and motives of confidence in God. The psalmist begins by inviting himself to praise God: Lauda, anima mea, Dominum. What follows is his answer: Yes, I will praise, etc.

13452 "Spiritus ejus." That is: The spirit or the soul of each one of them. "Revertetur in terram suam." We may see an analogous passage in Psalm 103:30.

13453 Goodness, wisdom, power, providence, justice, and mercy of God.

13454 This verse may be understood of the terrestrial Jerusalem, built again after the captivity of Babylon; but we may also understand it of the spiritual Jerusalem, of the holy Church, and of the celestial Jerusalem. In the same manner can the two following verses be understood in a spiritual sense: God with tender mercy heals the wounds of penitent souls, and he knows all those that are predestined to shine as stars in the firmament of eternity (Dan. 12:3; Matt. 13:43).

13455 This means that if God hears the voice of animals, great and small, that invoke him in their wants, he will with greater reason hear men (Matt. 6:26). But they should put confidence in him, and not reckon on their own strength, as is said in the following verses. Verses 8, 9, and 10, recall to mind those of Psalm 103:14, 15.

13456 It is interpreted and applied differently; the sense which appears to us most natural is this: After the invitation of the first verse the psalmist says that it is God who gives peace and abundance, v. 2, 3; that it is he also that sends trials, sufferings, typified by the rigors of winter, v. 4, 5, 6, and that he puts an end to them when it pleases him, v. 7. All the nations participate more or less in these goods and in these evils; but a privilege eminently distinguishes the people of God: it is the happiness of knowing his holy law, v. 8, 9. And if this privilege has been great for the people of Israel, instructed by the prophets, how much greater is it for the new people, formed by the divine Master himself, and enriched by so many graces!

13457 Jesus Christ, of whom David was a figure, is properly the Saint of God, the Saint by eminence, he whom God has glorified above every one else in a wonderful manner, v. 4; our Master and our Model, he reminds us at first of the efficacy of prayer: then he exhorts us to detach ourselves from the goods of this world, to flee from sin, to practise virtue, and to seek only justice, sanctity, by putting our whole confidence in God.

13458 It is an answer to the previous question: Quis ostendit nobis bona? Some explain this verse differently by the words: Lumen vultus tui—The light of Thy countenance. They understand the light of natural reason, impressed—signatum—on the superior part of the human soul, which is created after the image of God; this light is given to all men, that they may be able to distinguish the true goods from those that are false, as well as the way that leads to true happiness; but not all walk this way; hence the just man says in the singular number: "In corde meo," not In cordibus nostris. Interior joy is the inheritance of a good conscience.

13460 "In adjutorio." St. Jerome translates: In abscondito: In the secret or hiding place.

13461 "Liberavit." In the Hebrew and in the Greek this is in the future tense: Liberabit; which joined to the preceding words, signifies: I hope that he will deliver me.

13466 This psalm is the last of the fifteen which are called Gradual psalms. See note of Psalm 119, page 465.

13467 The holy old man sighed after the end of his exile on this earth, so full of misery and dangers; but the Holy Ghost had revealed to him (Luke, 2:26) that he would not die before he had seen the Messias; therefore, seeing this happy condition accomplished, and regarding as granted the grace that he solicited, he says with assurance: "Nunc dimittis." Then he announces the providential destiny of the divine Infant who had come to enlighten and to save all nations. We may compare this prophecy with those that we read in the Magnificat, page 459, and in the Benedictus, page 344, where the conversion of the Gentiles is announced in terms less explicit. Cornelius à Lapide says that this canticle is recited every evening, to remind us of death before sleep, which is the image of death, and in order that we may prepare for it by desiring it, after the example of St. Simeon.

13544 Cardinal Villecourt (1. 3, ch. 38) informs us that this anonymous author was an abbe named Coyer, whose person and whose books have hardly been noticed in France. However this may be, his sacrilegious utopia touched the zeal of the holy bishop, and has produced for us a few more good pages, which appeared in 1767 with The Truth of Faith.

13573 In the Life of the saint by Abelly, 1. 4. ch. 5, this Place is called Niolo, situated in the island of Corsica, where a mission was given in 1652. This Life presents many other very interesting details about the good done in the missions given by the children of St. Vincent de Paul.—Ed.

13574 See treatise on the EXERCISES OF THE MISSIONS, ch. x.

13576 These objections are refuted more at length in the Letter to a Bishop. page 73.

13585 Two or three days after the beginning of the mission St. Alphonsus replaced the evening exhortations by another exercise: at the end of the great sermon in the evening the women left the church and only the men remained, who, the lights having been extinguished, took the discipline in common. All the missionaries had to be present; one of them began by summing up the motives of the sermon that had just been preached, and tried to inspire his hearers with sentiments of compunction so as to dispose them for this act of penance. Then the men could be seen weeping on account of their sins, and trying to satisfy the justice of God. (Tannoia and Villecourt, 1. 2, ch. 52. See the Method of giving Missions in this treatise.)—ED.

13593 According to Tannoia and Villecourt, 1. 2, ch. 52, this was the practice followed by St. Alphonsus in his missions: Before the evening sermon, when the people were assembled in the church, a part of the Rosary was recited, not in Latin according to the Italian custom, but in the vernacular, in order that the people might understand what they said, and that, accustoming themselves to recite the Rosary in this way, they might subsequently continue this practice. The missionary took care to explain how pleasing it is to the Blessed Virgin, and to point out to the people the indulgences that were attached to it, especially did he recommend the recitation of the Rosary (or five decades) every evening, in common, with their families. 13688 In regard to this, we read in the life of the holy author: "Affections on the Passion were then so tender in the mouth of Alphonsus that torrents of tears could be seen flowing in the church: before, the people wept through sorrow for having sinned; in this meditation, they shed tears of love. To move the sensibility of the people, he exhibited before their eyes, in the last of these meditations, a large picture which he had himself painted, and in which Jesus Christ was represented dead on the cross, having his limbs all covered with blood and wounds. This exercise, so touching, produced the greatest fruit on the missions" (Tannoia and Villecourt, 1. 2, ch. 52).

We have collected the different teachings of St. Alphonsus on mental prayer, so that it forms a complete treatise: it is to be found in Volume 111., page 252.—ED.

13689 There is here question of the two strophes Pange lingua and Tantum ergo, which are found further on at the end of the Acts for the Visit to the Blessed Sacrament. It was a particular custom to chant these two strophes for Benediction, instead of the last two, Tantum ergo and Genitori, according to the common rule.—ED.

13690 It is needless to repeat that these practices are unknown outside of Italy.—ED.

13692 Pope Pius 1X., by a Rescript of March 27, 1852, deigned to grant other indulgences, namely: A plenary indulgence, on the anniversary of the erection of any cross, or on the Sunday following, as also on the Feasts of the Finding and of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross; conditions requisite: To confess and to communicate; to visit the cross, or one of the crosses erected, and a church or a public oratory and there to pray for some time to the intention of the Holy Father.

Indulgence of thirty days every time one recites devoutly before the crosses erected, five "Our Fathers," five "Hail Marys," and five "Glory be to the Fathers," in memory of the wounds of our Lord.—ED.

13998 At the present time money with us is not a mere medium of private exchange for the purposes of housekeeping; it is a medium of commercial exchange. It represents not use value, but market value. Formerly Church and State together enacted a number of laws to restrain the taking of interest. At this day the State has repealed those laws, and the Church has officially signified that she no longer insists on them. Still she maintains dogmatically that there is such a sin as usury, and what it is, as defined in the Fifth Council of the Lateran. See Moral Philosophy, article Usury, page 255, by Rev. 14005 Let us not forget that if material means are wanting to us, we can always, and should always, have recourse to God with confidence, by imploring his mercy and by offering him our good works, or at least our good will with the merits of Jesus Christ. God who is our Father, a Father infinitely rich and infinitely good, will deign without doubt to supply our indigence, either by procuring for us what is wanting, or by himself repairing all our wrongs done to our neighbors, living or dead. 14024 Let us here add that the two sacraments, namely: Baptism and Penance, are commonly called the sacraments of the dead, because they were instituted to restore the life of grace to those that are deprived of it by sin. 14124 In a notice to the reader, prefixed to the Glories of Mary, St. Alphonsus explains the sense in which he wished his doctrine regarding the privileges of the Blessed Virgin to be understood. He concludes this explanation in the following words: "Then, to say all in a few words, the God of all holiness, in order to glorify the Mother of the Redeemer, has decreed and ordained, that her great charity should pray for all those for whom her Divine Son has paid and offered the most superabundant price of his precious blood, in which alone is 'our salvation, life, and resurrection.' And on the foundation of this doctrine, and inasmuch as they accord with it, I have intended to lay down my propositions, which the saints, in their affectionate colloquies with Mary, and in their fervent discourses upon her, have not hesitated to assert." Glories of Mary, Monza Edition, vol. 1., pp. 11, 12.

In the third chapter of the first volume (pp. 123, 124), St. Alphonsus compares the hope which we place in the Blessed Virgin to the confidence which a person has in a minister of state whom he asks to procure a favour from his sovereign.

"Whatsoever Mary obtains for us, she obtains it through the merits of Jesus Christ, and because she prays in the name of Jesus Christ." Glories of Mary, vol. 1., p. 188.

"Mary, then, is said to be omnipotent in the manner in which omnipotence can be understood of a creature; for a creature is incapable of a divine attribute. Thus she is omnipotent, inasmuch as she obtains by her prayers whatever she asks." Ibid., p. 223.

To obtain favours through the intercession of Mary, by practising devout exercises in her honour, "the first condition is, that we perform our devotions with a soul free from sin, or, at least, with a desire to give up sin." "If a person wish to commit sin with the hope of being saved by the Blessed Virgin, he shall thus render himself unworthy and incapable of her protection." Glories of Mary, vol. ii., pp. 325, 326.

14133 He was declared VenerabU by Pope Pius IX., May 14, 1876, and beatified by Leo XI1I., January 29, 1888.

14134 Only the Text of the Rule is here given, not the Constitutions.

14135 "Secular priests," that is to say, those that are not Regulars properly so-called, who make solemn vows, whilst in the Congregation only simple vows are made. But before God simple vows are not of less binding force than solemn vows, as we may see in Corp. Jur., Rursus quidam (Qui cleric. vel vovent. 6): Quum simplex votum, apud Deum, non minus obliget quam solemne. The only difference that is found between these two kinds of vows consists in a greater difficulty to break the bond contracted by solemn vows, this being a privilege established not by divine right, but by the Church, in accordance with the Bull of Gregory XII1., Ascendente Domino, promulgated May 26, 1854, in favor of the Society of Jesus, and striking with anathema whoever would dare to say: "That all those that have not been solemnly professed in the aforesaid Society cannot be true members of this body, nor be really and properly religious, but that they are simple seculars, subject to the jurisdiction of the Ordinaries, and that not the Society, nor the Superiors, nor We ourselves possess, or acquire, or have the power to confer upon the Superiors any right by virtue of such vows. Now those that hold this opinion do not consider that the solemnity of the vows is derived only from an ecclesiastical institution; that the three vows of this Society, though simple, have been recognized by the Holy See as substantial vows of religion; and that those that make them are truly engaged in the religious state, since by these vows they consecrate themselves, in fact, give themselves, to the Society, and devote themselves to God's service." The solemnity is, therefore, not essential to religious profession. The principal reason why St. Alphonsus wished to adhere to simple vows was because simple vows allow greater facility for the dismissal of subjects that do not persevere in the spirit of their vocation; for he preferred a small number of fervent subjects, faithful to regular observance—such as they should be in order to preserve perfect Community life, which is the essential basis of his Institute,—to a larger number, who might otherwise possess brilliant talents. Moreover, wishing on the other hand to strengthen the bond that was to attach the subjects to the Congregation, and to supply as much as possible the defect of the solemnity, the holy founder took care to add to the three ordinary vows of religion the vow and oath of perseverance till death. By virtue of this oath of fidelity, received and accepted by the Congregation, the profession that is made therein assumes the character of a contract, and consequently becomes an obligation of justice, which cannot be removed except by legitimate dispensation.

14136 "Subject," in all that has reference to apostolic labors. (See further on, page 70, n. 1.)

It may be well to mention here what we read in the resolutions drawn up in the General Chapters, held under the presidency of the holy founder himself, in regard to the fitness the subjects should endeavor to acquire to correspond to the end of their vocation: "In order to attain more perfectly the end of the Institute, which consists in the sanctification of the people, the members of the Congregation shall unite the study of the sciences to a most virtuous life. They shall, therefore, strive with all diligence to attain proficiency in all the sciences, both human and divine, and should especially be learned in sacred literature, so that under all circumstances they may be able to render useful service to the Church. An illiterate workman, even though he may be a man of prayer, is like a soldier without weapons. They shall, therefore, do all in their power to make continual progress in science as well as in virtue, in order that they may be the instruments best adapted to perform the duties of the apostolic ministry.

14138 The General Chapter, over which the holy founder presided in 1764, permitted the giving of retreats outside of the time of giving missions, if retreats are asked for by the bishops.

14144 "Lectors," or those that are charged with the duty of teaching the sciences to the students.

14145 By a decree, dated July 2, I841, Gregory XVI. divided the Congregation into several Provinces. It concerns the Rector Major to erect new ones with the approbation of the Holy See, and he appoints the Provincials with their two Consultors every three years.

14147 The Rector Major for the government of each Province appoints a Provincial Superior and two Consultors, the first of whom is the Ad-monitor, and the second is the Secretary. The Provincial and his Consultors appoint a Procurator of the Province, admit or dismiss novices, make or permit certain expenses, etc. The Provincial has jurisdiction over the subjects and the local Rectors of his Province, he visits the houses every year, and renders an account to the Rector Major.

14152 In another work (Volume XII.) the holy author expresses himself in these words: "God wills that all men should be saved, but not in the same way. As in heaven he has distinguished d ifferent degrees of glory, so on earth he has established different states of life, as so many different ways of gaining heaven" (Ch. 1I. § 2). The choice is not arbitrary: "To enter into any state of life, a divine vocation is necessary; for without such a vocation it is, if not impossible, at least most difficult to fulfil the obligations of our state, and obtain salvation. The reason of this is evident; for it is God who in the order of his Providence assigns to each one of us his state of life and afterwards provides us with the graces and the help suitable to the state to which he calls us" (Ch. X.). We ought to be persuaded and ought never to forget that from all eternity God thinks with love of each one of us, just as a good father thinks of his only son.—ED.

14163 "Ipsi fuerunt rebelles lumini; nescierunt vias ejus."—Job, xxiv. 13.

14164 "En, proferam vobis spiritum meum."—I'rov. i. 23.

14165 "Quia vocavi, et renuistis . . . despexistis omne consilium meum. . . . Ego quoque in interitu vestro ridebo et subsannabo, cum vobis id, quod timebatis, advenerit."—Ibid. i. 24–26.

14166 "Tunc invocabunt me, et non exaudiam; mane consurgent, et non invenient me. Eo quod exosam habuerint disciplinam, . . . nec acquieverint consilio meo, et detraxerint universœ correptioni meœ."—Ibid. i. 28–30.

14170 "Nemo mittens manum suam ad aratru, et respiciens retro, aptus est regno Dei."—Ibid. 62.

14174 "Si vel levem arripuerit prorogationem."—Ad pop. Aut. hom. 56.

14175 "Festina, quœso te, et hœrentis in salo naviculœ funem magis prœcide, quam solve."—Ad Paulin, de St. Scr.

14176 We must here call to mind what the author says in the Christian Rule of Life, chap. i.: "You should choose your director; consult him on all more important matters; and obey him in everything. He who obeys his confessor need not fear to go astray: He that heareth you, heareth Me (Luke, x. 16). The voice of the confessor is the voice of God." We should, therefore, consult at least the confessor, who may delay giving an opinion when he thinks fit to do so on account of the importance of the decision he has to render.

The following are, according to St. Alphonsus, the three principal signs of a true vocation to the religious state: "1. We should have a good end in view, such as to remove from the dangers of the world, the better to assure ourselves of salvation, and to become more closely united with God. 2. We should not be subject to any positive impediment, such as the want of health, or of talent, or parents who are necessitous ('in necessitate gravi'-Theol. mor. 1. 4, n. 66)—matters that should be submitted to the judgment of the Superiors, towards whom we should be frank in telling the truth. 3. We should be admitted by the Superiors of the Institute. (Counsels to Novices.)"

Moreover, in the Church there are different religious Institutes, different kinds of perfection. It is not enough to know that one is called to the religious state; one must also examine for what Institute, for what Community the Lord has destined us, and one must follow in every point the impulse of grace. (See Homo apost. tr. ult. n 39.)

14181 "Cum spiritualia impediunt parentes, nec agnoscendi quidem sunt."—In Jo. hom. 84.

14183 "Frequenter amici carnales adversantur profectui spirituali."—2. 2. q. 189, a. 10.

14185 "Audi, filia, et vide, et inclina aurem tuam; et obliviscere populum tuum, et domum patris tui."-Ps. Xliv. 11.

14187 "Nemo mittens manum ad aratrum, et respiciens retro, aptus est regno Dei."-Luke, ix. 61.

14189 "Ab hoc consilio, primo quidem, amovendi sunt carnis propinqur; dicitur enim: 'Causam tuam tracta cum amico tuo.' Propinqui autem carnis, in hoc negotio, amici non sunt, sed inimici, juxta sententiam Domini: 'Inimici hominis, domestici ejus.'"-Matth. x. 36.

14190 "I say 'in which reigns exact observance;' for it would be, perhaps better to remain in the world than to enter a religious Institute in which relaxation has been introduced." We see that this remark is made by the author himself; he also says elsewhere, "Si institutum relaxatum est, melius erit alicui ordinarie loquendi, quod in sœculo remaneat." (Hom. apost. tr. ult. n. 39.)

14191 "Si quis vult post me venire, abneget semetipsum, et tollat crucem suam, et sequatur me."—Matth. xvi. 24.

14192 "Vincenti dabo manna absconditum."—Apoc. ii. 17.

14193 "Crucem vident, unctionem non vident."—In Dedic, s. 1.

14195 "Exsuperat omnem sensum."—Phil. iv. 7.

14196 "Gustate, et videte quoniam suavis est Dominus."-Ps. xxxiii. 9.

14197 Vincenti dabo manna absconditum."-Apoc. ii. 17.

14198 In the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer the vow of poverty comprises the renunciation of every dignity and every benefice or employment. Moreover, to the three vows are added the vow and oath of perseverance.

14199 "Non paupertas, sed amor paupertatis virtus est."—Epist. 100.

14201 "Frigus, famem, sitim, et contemptum."

14203 "Inimici hominis, domestici ejus "—Ib. 36.

14204 "Qui non odit patrem suum, et matrem, . . . etc., non potest esse meus discipulus."—Luke, xiv. 26.

14205 We here read in the first edition: "By the grace of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, we do not see in this our little Congregation the scandal of a subject seeking for some employment that might give him a name, such as that of Superior, preacher, or confessor, and the like."

14206 "Joannes, pete a me, quid vis. . . . Domine, pati et contemni pro te."

14208 "Ego, quæ placita sunt ei, facio semper." John, viii. 29.

14212 "Novitium Prudentem in congregatione durare impossibile est. . . . Discernere superioris est, subditi obedire,"-Ibid.

Ecce quare præcepit eis nihil ferre, quia omnia debentur eis pro labore. De jure naturali est, ut, illis qui serviunt communitati in spiritualibus, provideantur a communitate in temporalibus necessaria. Non ergo prohibuit eis ferre necessaria ad sustentationem hujus vitæ, sed ut demonstraret hæc eis deberi ab illis quibus prædicarent. 14363 Matth. viii. 14; Mark, i. 29.

14364 Matth. xix. 27.

14366 "Utrum habere aliquid in communi diminuat perfectionem religionis."

14372 "Talem religionem decet paupertas tails quæ minimam sollicitudinem ingerat."

14374 John, iv. 8.

14376

"Quocirca veteres fundatores sanxerunt ut religiosi haberent bona in communi, ut sine cura vacarent orationi, studio, prædicationi, sicut patet ex Constitutionibus Sancti Basilii, Sancti Augustini, Sancti Bernardi, Sancti Dominici."—In Jo. xi. 6.

14377

"Convenientius est habere bona in communi; quare hoc in iis congruentius et perfectius est."

14378

"Austeritatem vitæ charitate in proximum compensant."

August 7.

14381 Uncle of St. Alphonsus.

14382 "Sollicitudo omnium Ecclesiarium."—2 Cor. xi. 28.

14383 Of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.

14384 This Institution, founded in 1729, had for its aim the forming and the raising to the priesthood of young men brought from China, who afterwards would return home to maintain and propagate religion. St. Alphonsus also entered that college.

14385 St. Alphonsus was also a member of this Congregation, which counted among its members the flower of the clergy.

14387 "Multi dicunt animæ meæ: Non est salus ipsi in Deo ejus."—Ps. iii. 3.

14388 "Si quid petieritis patrem in nomine meo, dabit vobis."-John, xvi. 23.

14389 "Evangelizare pauperibus misit me."—Luke, iv. 18.

14390 "Væ mihi si non evangelizavero!"—1 Cor. ix. 16.

14391 St. Alphonsus abstains from speaking of the share that he had in this success. We read in his Life that though he was not able personally to aid Father Sarnelli, he yet lent him his assistance in an efficacious manner by the help of his counsels, and by securing in his favor the protection of eminent persons.—Tannoia and Villecourt, 1. 2, ch. 16.

14392 The reader is here reminded of what has been said above, page 259, of the great work on the glories of Mary.

14393 This good father continues in fact to preach by his writings that are still being reprinted; two editions of 1836 and 1848 we have now before us.

14395 Cardinal Villecourt, 1. 2, ch. 33, says that he died April 19, 1750.

14397 This Father was Alphonsus himself. Sportelli introduced him to his friend, and it is then that he spoke to him about the new Institute. Curzius thus understood the mystery of the providential dream that he had had: he clearly saw his heavenly vocation, and immediately resolved to follow it by rendering thanks to God for such a favor.—Tannoia and Villecourt, 1. 1, at the end.

14398 Father Tannoia also praises the obedience of this first brother of the Congregation. At Scala, being charged with the duty of ringing the bell for the exercises of the Community, he never failed to do so even when he was alone at the house. His last illness lasted forty-nine days, at the house of an ecclesiastic who had the charity to receive him. He died on Saturday, September 18, 1745. The corpse was solemnly carried to the church of the Redemptorists, and St. Alphonsus, who was then at Iliceto, offered up the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass for him, being so affected with grief at the loss of the holy brother that he burst into tears, which several times during the obsequies prevented him from singing the prayers. People struggled with one another for the possession of the things that had been used by Vitus as if they were holy relics. Mgr. Amato, bishop of Lacedogna, had entertained so high an esteem for the deceased, that after the lapse of a few years he obtained permission to keep the skull of the saintly brother, and he placed it on the desk before which he usually made his daily meditation. After twenty years—when the bishop was dead—this venerable relic was restored to the house of the Redemptorists at Iliceto. (Tannoia and Villecourt, 1. 2, ch. 20.)

14399 This little notice and the sermon that follows are found immediately after the last of the Abridged Sermons for Sundays in a Neapolitan edition which appeared in 1774. 14979 St. Alphonsus published this Rule towards the end of the year 1756 (Villecourt, I. vi. ch. iii.) He had that year introduced a wonderful reform into the seminary of Nola, which was in a very bad state, as is related by Father Tannoia (Book II. ch. 44). It is without doubt in consequence of this undertaking, which was crowned with such success, that he composed the present opuscule. In order to understand certain details, it should he known that by a seminary we here understand an establishment which comprises not only what we call a Great Seminary, but also all the classes of humanities, and even of the preparatory courses, to which very young boys are admitted; the whole, however, is divided into several separated sections.—ED.

15506 Acemetic, or sleepless monks, were a celebrated order in the East. They were called the sleepless, because night and day they kept up Divine psalmody without intermission; the community was divided into three sections, and each spent eight hours out of the twenty-four singing the praises of God. 16101 St. Augus. Epis. 102, alias 49, cont. Pagan, b. 2, 3.

16731 Mother Angiola del Cielo, called in the world Maria de Vito, was born at Naples in the year 1700. At the age of 19, burning with the desire to consecrate herself to the Spouse of virgins, she in company with her sister entered a conservatory which had recently been founded in the little town of Scala. Her great piety and the soundness of her judgment were such that, though still very young, she was considered worthy to fill the responsible position of mistress of novices, and in the year 1729 she was elected Superior of the Community. Understanding, however, from certain supernatural revelations that another Rule, the principle aim of which should be the continual imitation of our Saviour Jesus Christ, was to be substituted for the Rule hitherto observed, Mother Angiola employed all her energy to bring about this change, since the above-mentioned revelations had received the approval of St. Alphonsus during the spiritual exercises given by him in September, 1730. The following year, in the month of May, the conservatory of Scala adopted the new Rule, taking at the same time the name of the Most Holy Saviour. Thus was most solemnly begun the Institute known today by the name of the nuns of the Most Holy Redeemer or Redemptoristines, whose Rule received the approbation of the Holy See in 1750.

Mother Angiola was frequently re-elected Superior, so that we might almost say she always presided over that fervent Community. She enjoyed the good fortune of having for upwards of ten years the Venerable Gennaro Sarnelli as her spiritual director, and the numerous letters addressed to her, which are now in our possession, show us clearly the height of sanctity to which she attained.

This holy religious, whose memory is blessed among the children of St. Alphonsus, died a holy death, in the year 1782.

16732 Tommaso Falcoia, a member of the Order of the Pious Workers, was the spiritual director of the nuns of Scala. He was at that time at Rome, where during the same month he was consecrated bishop.

16733 Cor mio, confida e spera:

Che la tempesta ancor,

Condune sa talor

La nave in porto.

16734 Giovanni Mazzini was one of the first companions of the saint.

16735 These little remembrances were written on separate small slips of paper; they have all been lost.

16736 Sister Maria Raffaella was the sister of Mother Angiola del Cielo, and she it was who in the year 1767 founded the monastery of the nuns of the Most Holy Redeemer, at St. Agatha of the Goths.

16738 The word imprecations is here used ironically.

16739 "Motives for Loving God," explained in meditations taken from the works of several authors of the Society of Jesus, work published by P. Jacopo Sanvitale, S. J.

16740 A sacred diary for devout clients of Mary, for every day in the year, by P. Francesco Marchese, of the Oratory at Rome.

16741 Mention is made of her in the preceding letter.

16742 This Congregation referred to was an association of diocesan missionaries, called the association of apostolic missions, of which St. Alphonsus was always a member.

16743 Reference is here made to the foundation of the Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour, which in the year 1749 received the approbation of Benedict XIV., under the title of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.

16744 This priest was one of the first companions of St. Alphonsus.

16745 Our readers will thank us for giving here a sketch of the life of Mgr. Falcoia, the holy prelate and zealous apostle, whose name occurs so often in the following letters. He was born on the 16th of May, 1663. Having spent his youth happily in the acquisition of virtue, and in the study of the humanities, he felt himself drawn to a life of perfection. Following the advice of that venerable and saintly man, Antonio Torres, he at the age of twenty turned his back upon the world, and dedicated himself entirely to God and to the salvation of souls in the zealous Congregation of the Pious Workers.

Scarcely ordained priest, he was considered worthy to be sent to Rome in company with that great servant of God, Ludovico Sabbatini, in order to found there the first house of the Institute. He spent there twenty years, carrying out many works conducive to the glory of God, and to the salvation of souls. After his return to Naples, he was called upon to fill the highest and most difficult offices of the Congregation which he did with the greatest care and diligence, working, however, at the same time as a fervent and untiring missionary. Here too, as in Rome, and wherever he appeared, he drew all hearts to himself by the odor of his virtues. His spirit of prayer, of mortification, his zeal for the salvation of souls, and, above all, his earnest desire to copy as closely as possible the example of our Redeemer, Jesus Christ, endeared him to all who knew him.

God now wished to place this great light upon the candlestick, to illumine the Church; he was accordingly selected to rule the diocese of Castellammare, which position he retained up to the clay of his death; all his thoughts were concentrated upon the discharge of his duties by word and deed, God aiding and confirming his works by signs and wonders as frequent as they were extraordinary.

But the greatest glory of Falcoia was to have been chosen by God to form and guide the illustrious Apostle and Doctor of modern times, St. Alphonsus. In fact, the saint had him as director from the 24th of August 1732 to the end of Falcoia's life, and he surrendered himself so entirely into his hands that he bound himself by vow to obey him. He depended on him in everything, especially in the foundation of the Institute, and in the manifold contradictions to which the work gave rise. The fatherly solicitude of the loving and prudent director was equal to the filial confidence of his disciple. He consoled St. Alphonsus in all his afflictions, and inspired him with courage, telling him that though the Congregation was as yet as small as a grain of mustard seed, yet the time would come when it would be spread throughout the world.

We shall select only a few among many beautiful instances of this. On the 31st of July, 1733, he wrote to St. Alphonsus: "Happy we who have been selected, for we by our humiliations, fatigue and suffering have to bear the triumphal chariot of divine glory through the whole world. Great courage then, my dear Alphonsus!

Scalpri saluhris ictibus

Et tunsione plurima,

Fabri polita malleo

Hanc saxa molem construunt."

[Many a blow and biting sculpture

Polished well those stones elect,

In their places now compacted

By the heavenly architect.]

On the 28th of July, of the following year, he wrote the following words: "Do not trouble yourself about anything else, neither about the work, nor about yourself who have been chosen by the divine Majesty as the principal instrument for the erection of the new edifice, and for carrying his name among the peoples and kingdoms." He expressed the very same sentiments on his deathbed when in a spirit of prophecy he said of the new Congregation: This work comes from God, and it will spread like the flowers of the field. Shortly after he departed this life with every mark of sanctity, and predestination on the 20th of April, 1743.

We possess more than one hundred letters written by Falcoia to St. Alphonsus, but very few of those written hy the saint to his director. There is good reason to believe that when these letters passed into the hands of St. Alphonsus after the death of Falcoia, he destroyed them in a spirit of humility.

16746 The saint was a member of the Congregation of the Apostolic Missions, which, as a reward for his indefatigable labors, had given him a chaplaincy.

16747 The Congregation disapproving of the saint's undertaking had decided upon his expulsion.

16748 One of his first companions, who opposed his Rule and his work in order to embrace a new Institute.

16749 Maria Celeste Crostarosa was born at Naples, October 11, 1697. It was she who, in consequence of a revelation, suggested to St. Alphonsus the plan for the foundation of the Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour. Falling under the influence of Don Vincenzo Mannarini, and especially of Don Silvestro Tosquez, after the foun dation of the Institute, she began to withdraw from the spiritual guidance of Mgr. Falcoia. She, moreover, began to entertain certain ideas with regard to the establishment of a Rule entirely at variance with those held by St. Alphonsus and by Mgr. Falcoia himself. In consequence of this, Providence permitted her to be dismissed from the convent. After leaving Scala, she reformed a conservatory of maidens at Nocera. Having been called to Foggia, she founded there another conservatory for the daughters of the nobility, which is at present, under the title of the Most Holy Saviour, a source of great edification for that town. She died with the reputation of heroic virtue, September 14, 1755, and her body remained in a wonderful state of preservation for many years.

16750 The Sister had written to the saint these cutting remarks.

16751 Don Bartolomeo Carace had been the first spiritual director of the nun.

16752 Don Silvestro Tosquez had a brother who filled a very high position at the Imperial Court of Vienna.

16753 Chap. x. Foundations.

16754 The Sister had written various rules, which she said were revealed to her by Jesus Christ.

16755 At this period St. Alphonsus and Mgr. Falcoia intended to combine the work of the missions with that of the schools.

16757 By the advice of Alphonsus Don Giovanni Battista di Donato had become Superior of the new Community of Scala.

16758 Nicola Guerriero was Bishop of Scala.

16759 She was a nun at Scala, and had received many supernatural favors.

16760 Our saint had given the spiritual exercises to these nuns in the month of March of the same year, 1733.

16761 Although St. Alphonsus wrote many letters to this priest, the latter could not be induced to enter our Institute, for which he however, always entertained the greatest affection.

16762 The Venerable Gennaro Sarnelli.

16763 S. Maria del Vignanello was a hermitage not far from Villa degli Schiavi, where the holy founder had opened the second house of his Institute, and where he had been living for about a month.

16764 A priest that tried a work analogous to that of St. Alphonsus.

16765 He refers to the hope placed in D. Silvestro Tosquez of obtaining the Imperial approbation through his brother who had great influence at the court of Vienna.

16766 Gennaro Rendina, horn at Naples, September 28, 1707, entered the new Institute where as a lay-brother he died after a holy life at an advanced age.

16767 The saint, as appears from his journal, before founding his Congregation, had cherished the idea of consecrating himself to the missions in heathen countries. Two years after the foundation he wished to carry out his intention; but Mgr. Falcoia in a letter dated July 20, 1734, and Father Tommaso Pagano, his first director, in another letter of August 4, the same year, forbade him to do so.

16768 The founder of the Congregation of the Holy Family among the members of which St. Alphonsus had lived for two years. The seat of this Congregation at Naples was called the Chinese College, its object being to train missionaries for China.

16769 Camigliano, a town in the diocese of Calvi.

16770 Pietro Agosto Scorza, born at Torre Maggiore, July 11, 1676, was first bishop of Teramo; then from April 9, 1731, archbishop of Amalfi, where he died in 1747, or at the beginning of 1748.

16771 In the month of January of this year, the saint with the Venerable Gennaro Sarnelli, and others had given a mission at Positano. On this occasion there was question of founding here a house of the Congregation, but because the municipality wished that the holy founder should assume the obligation of taking care of the public schools, the project was not carried out.

16772 The mediation of the prelate proved useless; but the saint continued nevertheless to take care of the school, as appears from one of his letters addressed to his director, Mgr. Falcoia, dated October 5, of this year, in which we read: "The small income of six ducats [25 fr.] for the school makes no impression upon me, because we should not show the least shadow of being desirous of money, just as we should in no way lose confidence in divine Providence; and since Monsignor would feel displeased if the school were abandoned, we shall not abandon it on any account; the more so as it is not a little service, which is blessed by God, to educate ten or twelve souls who, I hope, will receive less a literary than a moral education. . . ."

16775 The foundation at Ciorani.

16776 This affair of the Ven. Gennaro Sarnelli our saint thus describes in his sketch of Sarnelli's life: "As D . Gennaro saw that these unhappy woman by being scattered through the whole city did immense harm and gave great scandal, he was convinced that the only method of remedying so great an evil was to compel them to live together outside of Naples. The whole city and God, above all, know what labors and expense this project occasioned him, for the furtherance of which he composed several books entitled the "Abuses of Prostitution." This undertaking drew down on him the opposition and the reproaches of friends as well as of enemies, for as they looked upon the thing as impossible, they were always striving to make him abandon it, and were bitterly ridiculing it. But his confidence in God was strong and unshaken, although he was alone and devoid of the help of man. He managed so well with the first ministers of the king, our protector, that he at last had the satisfaction of seeing his desires fulfilled."—We may read the details of this great undertaking in the little work entitled: "Le vénérable serviteur de Dieu, le P. Janvier-Marie Sarnelli."—Paris, Jules Vic., 1886.

16777 Neapolitan Missionaries.—So called from the Church of St. George Major, the seat of their Congregation.

16778 Constantino Vigilante, Bishop of Caiazzo, was very much pained at the departure of the Fathers from Villa degli Schiavi, and did all in his power to induce them to return. We cannot ascertain why the bishop was at the time somewhat displeased with the Fathers; at any rate, it is certain that this estrangement did not last very long; for we learn from numerous documents that he was ever very friendly to St. Alphonsus and to the Congregation.

16779 This was most probably Prince Francesco Carafa, lord of the hamlet Villa degli Schiavi.

16780 Father Cesare Sportelli, a man of saintly life, was born at Mola di Bari in the year 1699. Having passed his course of studies very successfully at Naples, he devoted himself to the study of law, in which, thanks to his great talents, he made wonderful progress. Having discovered that a Congregation under the title of the Most Holy Saviour had been founded, he turned his back upon the world, and became the first companion of St. Alphonsus. In the year 1742 he was chosen to be the first Superior of the house at Pagani, and in the year 1747, of the house at Caposele. He rendered great services on the missions. He died on the 19th of April, 1750. Before he breathed his last he began to sing In exitu Israel de Egypto, and in this joyous frame of mind he gave up his spirit to God. He wrought many miracles after his death; three years and six months after his death the body was found beautiful, entire and flexible.

16781 In the month of October 1737, the saint was giving a mission at Naples, in the church of the Holy Ghost.

16782 Father Giuglio Marocco , after the forced departure of the Fathers from Villa degli Schiavi, remained at Caiazzo, his native place, in order to treat of the affairs of their return to Villa.

16783 Prince Francesco Carafa, lord of Villa degli Schiavi, had declared himself against the Fathers. The Princess, his wife, who was very pious, made every effort to secure their return. See letter of May 25, 1759.

16784 Calvanico was at that time a village in the diocese of Salerno containing 1568 souls.

16785 Casimiro Rossi, born at Naples, March 11, 1685, was first bishop of Taranto, then from May 5, 1738 archbishop of Salerno, where he died in 1759.

16786 The saint had given a mission at Fisciano in the month of Novemher, 1739. He gave another at Castellammare in the parish of S. Salvatore at the beginning of 1740, and it is from this town that he writes the present letter.

16787 This great servant of God, born at Naples, September 12, 1702, entered the rising Congregation in September 1733. He was a living image of the holy founder, so that like him he lived only for God and the good of souls, for the salvation of whom he always labored with incomparable zeal and ardor, with the living voice of preaching, and with the publication of many celebrated works. Finally, after eleven years of apostolic labors, worn out by fatigue and austerities, he rendered his heautiful soul to God. The cause of his Beatification was introduced by the Sacred Congregation of Rites, December 3, 1874.

16788 E'en though there be no hope for me,

My God, I'll love Thee still;

Though lost, my love shall e'er be Thine,

For only Thou my heart canst fill.

16789 This work, written in Portuguese hy the Venerable servant of God, Father Thomas of Jesus, of the Order of St. Augustine, was translated into Italian by Father Louis Flori, S. J. [into French by Father Alleaume, S. J.]

16790 Father Giovanni Mazzini had the charge of applying the intentions of the Masses.

16791 This short note is the postscript to a letter of Don Cesare Sportelli, in which he announces to the bishop that on the 21st of July all the Fathers and Brothers of Ciorani had made their profession.

16793 This altogether paternal letter produced no effect upon Father Marocco; after the lapse of one month he left definitely the Institute, to which he was, however, not bound by any vow.

16794 Sant' Aniello, a village in the neighborhood of Naples, where the saint remained for the mission to be given in the suhurbs of the city.

16795 The priest D. Giuseppe Sparano, always a great friend of our saint, was born at Naples, December 22, 1709. In 1743 on account of his rare qualities he was chosen Canon of the Metropolitan church, synodal examiner, and later Superior of the Congregation of the Apostolic Missions, called Propaganda. In 1753, he published his "Historical Memoirs of the Church of Naples, and of that of the Congregation of the Apostolic Missions" (2 vols.) May 29, 1775, he was preconized Archhishop of Acerenza and Matera, and died the following year.

16796 Cardinal Spinelli refused to let St. Alphonsus depart, as he had placed the direction of the diocesan missions in his charge.

16797 About 85 francs.

16798 This was the residence of the Lazarists, named from the quarter where they lived.

16799 A work written by Ven. Gennaro Sarnelli, 2 vols. in 12mo (Naples, Festa Brothers.)

16800 To understand the reason for the citations given here, it is necessary to consult what Tannoia in his "Life of St. Alphonsus" has written of the opposition made to the Fathers of the Institute, in order to crush the new foundation at Pagani: "To jealousy there were added wrath and rancor; self-interest also came into play. When the Regulars perceived the great veneration and deference paid to our members, they hegan to persuade themselves that their daily alms were on the point of ceasing; in the same manner the priests feared that all legacies, not only Masses that might he said, but donations, etc., would flow into the coffers of the missionaries. Thus self-interest and jealousy took possession of the hearts of the clergy. And in a short time seculars were also infected with the poison. . . . . ."—Book ii. chap. xvii.

16801 "Detrimentum consideramus in jure quæsito, et non quærendo; unde non est attendendum quod alii non recipiunt eleemosynas, quas in præsenti recipiunt, quia hæ sunt in libertate elargientium."—Cap. un. De excess. Prælat. n. 49, tom. 3).

16803 "Attendendum est utile locorum spirituale."—Num. 68.

16805 "Nec tenere formare processum."

16806 "Non est necessaria citatio, si opulentia loci satis est ad sustentationem omnium."—Tom. I, consult. 179, num. 50.

16807 "Diminutio eleemosynarum, cum sint valde incerta, idcirco est præjudicium accidentale."

16808 "Ob imaginariam diminutionem eleemosynarum, non est impediendum opus publicum in publicam utilitatem."

16809 That is to say, the decree by which the Bishop of Nocera, Mgr. Nicolò di Dominicis, approved of the establishment of the house and church at Pagani.

16810 The adversaries of the Congregation, in fact, obtained from the royal counsel a decision forbidding anything new to be done.—Tannoia, book ii. chap. xxii.

16811 In this Act the bishop speaks of the blessing of the first stone of the church: "The blessing," says the prelate, "which we charged our Vicar-general, Don Nicola Ferri, to give, was in fact solemnly given in the month of last June, in the midst of a large number of people whose transports of joy recalled those of David singing and dancing before the Ark of the Lord. . . ."

16812 The following notice may be read in the catalogue of the Congregation about this holy subject: "July 10, 1745, there was admitted into the novitiate Celestino de Robertis, born May 19, 1719, in the town of Sieti, district of Giffoni, in the diocese and province of Salerno, not having yet received any of the Holy Orders. He made his profession into the hands of our Father, July 9, 1746, in our house of Santa Maria della Consolazione, at Iliceto. He died in the odor of sanctity in our house at Caposele, April 20, 1807. He so loved the Blessed Virgin that with one of his little pictures he worked prodigies, and when he desired to receive graces from her he used to say: 'Do me this favor.' He spent the greatest part of the day in prayer."

16813 The saint was then occupied in writing the little work "The Visits to the Most Holy Sacrament, and to the Blessed Virgin, for Every Day in the Month." He therefore changed his usual exclamation "Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!" into this: "Praised be the Most Holy Sacrament, and Mary Immaculate!"

16814 At this time there were many warlike movements of the Spanish troops in consequence of the death of Charles VI., as the Austrians were menacing the Neapolitan territory.

16815 Giuseppe Sersale, at that time Canon of the metropolitan church at Naples and later Archbishop of Sorrento, was a great friend of St. Alphonsus and of the Venerable Sarnelli.

16816 The Congregation of the apostolic missions to which the Venerable Father Sarnelli belonged.

16817 Tommaso Carace, a member of the same Congregation.

16818 They were seven in all.

16819 Giacomo Casati was Canon of the collegiate church at Iliceto, in the diocese of Bovino.

16820 The Prince of Castellaneta, D. Mattia Miroballo d' Aragona, had asked St. Alphonsus to give a mission at Iliceto.

16821 Father Xavier Rossi was born in the year 1706; he entered the Congregation a year after its foundation. He applied himself from the beginning to a perfect imitation of Jesus Christ, our Lord. He passed almost his whole life at Ciorani; confiding only in divine Providence, he began the building of the house into which he afterwards introduced the great work of the spiritual exercises. This great servant of God died in 1758 while looking fixedly at the images of Jesus and Mary.

16822 The Bishop of Foggia, to whose diocese the town of Foggia then belonged and where he resided several months of the year, was at that time Mgr. Giovanni Pietro Faccolli.

16823 Don Ignazio was a secular priest who accompanied the Fathers on missions.

16824 This secular priest accompanied the Fathers on the missions. He is the same of whom mention is afterwards made.

16825 D. Francesco Cantaldi, the founder of the house at Pagani, was afterwards as active in destroying the foundation as he had been before in securing it.

16827 D. Giovanni Oliviero was a penitent of the saint and lived at Naples.

16828 Father Mazzini was born at Naples, December 18, 1704. Having spent his youth in wonderful innocence, he afterwards devoted himself to the ecclesiastical state. Since the year 1723 he had heeu one of the most intimate friends of our saint. The Congregation having been established, it was not permitted him by his confessor to enter the Institute at once as he had wished to do; but after three years spent in earnest entreaties, he obtained the so much desired permission. An entire volume would not suffice to contain a narration of the virtues practised by this fervent servant of God. It suffices to say that he was worthy of being in every respect one of the dearest friends of St. Alphonsus. He survived the saint a few years, and so had the good fortune of giving his testimony in the process of Beatification. He died in the peace of the Lord, December 3, 1792.

16829 Pope Benedict XIV. wishing to promote in the kingdom of Naples the good custom of frequenting the sacraments had since September 8, 1744, delegated Cardinal Spinelli for this work.

Similiter Christifidelium pietatem confovere et devotionem augere cupientes, Indulgentiarum, quarum dispensatores idem SSmo Dominus esse Nos voluit, omnibus et singulis utriusque sexus, qui ubique civitatum et locorum Regni Neapolitani missionibus interfuerint; vel, legitimo impedimento detenti interesse non valentes, pias tamen preces pro spirituali earumdem missionum fructu ad Deum fuderint, septem annos cum totidem quarantenis libenter impertimur. Insuper omnibus Christifidelibus, qui vere pœnitentes et confessi ac SSmo Eucharistiæ sacramento refecti, ultima die missioni interfuerint, vel qui legitime præpediti præsentes esse non valentes, expleta tamen sacramentali confessione et communione, easdem, ut supra, preces ad Deum fuderint, plenariam omnium peccatorum suorum Indulgentiam et remissionem, per dictas tantum in supplici libello enunciatas missiones valituram, misericorditer in Domino concedimus et elargimur.

JOSEPHUS Cardinalis, Archiepiscopus.

JOSEPH ROMANO, Canonicus secret.

16831 A mixture of music and plain-chant very much in use in the second half of the eighteenth century. The inconveniences that resulted from this altogether wordly chant had for a long time made the Church forbid it to the monasteries; but an extraordinary infatuation always introduced it again. "There is nothing more ridiculous and more flat," says Jean-Jacque Rousseau with reason, "than these plain-chants that are adapted to modern music. We are under great obligations to the bishops, provosts, and singers who oppose this barbarous mixture."—Quoted by D. Guéranger, Institutions liturgiques, book, ii. chap. xx.

16832 This retreat was preached in the month of December 1745, on the occasion of the celebrated mission given at Foggia.

16834 Giuseppe de Liguori, father of St. Alphonsus, had died some weeks previously. He had secured to his son Alphonsus, an annual income of one hundred and fifty ducats payable to our saint after his death; moreover, he bequeathed to him at his death (December 1745) two hundred ducats as a special gift. Don Ercole, it seems, pretended that this last gift nearly annulled the former.—We here mention that the ducat is about equal to an American dollar, or to 4 francs, 25 centimes.

16836 This is treated of in the preceding letter.

16837 The Falcidian law guaranteed to the heir one fourth of the amount of the legacy which he was charged to pay.—The Trebbellian law guaranteed to the heir the fourth of the amount of the universal trusts which he was restoring.

16838 The saint here refers to the renunciation of his primogeniture.

16840 Father Villani, born February 8, 1706, in the town of Curtoli in the district of Sanseverino, was, in the year 1737, admitted into the Institute of St. Alphonsus of which after the holy founder he became the principal corner-stone. As he was a man of great learning, of tried virtue, and of singular prudence, many important offices were entrusted to him. He was successively Master of novices, several times Rector, then Consultor-General, Vicar-General, and before the death of St. Alphonsus, Superior-General of the houses in the kingdom of Naples. He died in 1792, greatly lamented by all.

16841 A Chapter was held in the house at Ciorani, October 12, 1746; but as the holy founder could not be present on account of ill health, he had the various decisions of the Chapter forwarded to him. The Fathers who had assembled decided upon some measures which, far from obtaining the approbation of the saint, were the cause why the Chapter was deferred till the year following.

16842 Father Sportelli had to repair to Naples to complete the foundation of the house of Mater Domini at Caposele.

16843 Some of the Fathers who were voters failed to be present at the Chapter, October 12, and it was decided that notwithstanding their absence the Chapter should be continued if they would not have arrived on the 25th of the same month.

16844 In fact, the Chapter was held in the month of October of the following year.

16845 Father Sportelli, President of the Chapter was entirely of the same opinion as the saint was, to whom in writing he had mentioned, October 10, 1746, his fears and cautions.

16846 Mgr. Giuseppe Nicolai, Archbishop of Conza from 1731 till 1759.

16847 Father Francesco Sanseverino, who afterwards became Archbishop of Palermo.

16849 See Letter 71.

16850 Sister Maria Celeste Crostarosa of whom we have given a short notice above (Letter 6) had founded at Foggia the monastery of the Most Holy Saviour about the year 1739.

16852 It seems that the Sisters had written to the Sacred Congregation and then through fear of persecutions had afterwards repented of this courageous act.

16853 During this year the saint remained at Naples about three months, in order to attend to the affairs of the Congregation and to gain the law-suit over the enemies of the house at Pagani.

16854 D. Girolamo had scarcely entered the novitiate when he received the sad news of the sudden death of his brother.

16855 The archpriest of Teora, the birth-place of D. Girolamo.

16856 D. Girolamo by the advice of Father Cafaro had made the preceding year the vow of entering the Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour.

16859 This was Marquis Brancone, Secretary of State.

16860 Father Francesco Pepe, S. J., a friend of St. Alphonsus.

16861 D. Vincenzo Mannarini, at that time Superior of the Congregation of the Most Blessed Sacrament, absolutely wished to re-unite his Congregation to the Congregation of St. Alphonsus.

16862 The Congregation of the Most Holy Sacrament took charge of public schools and could have houses in the cities.

16863 This is the law-suit brought by D. Francesco Contaldi against the house at Pagani.

16864 Father Cesare Sportelli thus wrote from Naples to Father Mazzini: "Father Rector Major has been strongly urged to accept the episcopate, and is still in great fear about it. He has, however, made a wonderful defence."

16865 Father Cesare Sportelli was then to treat in Caposele of the affair of a new foundation of the house of Mater Domini.

16866 We read the following account of this estimable member of the Institute in the catalogue of the Congregation:

"On the 7th of December, 1747, Francesco Margotta a priest and a native of Calitri, was admitted into the Congregation. He was in his forty-eighth year, and had been for some time a missionary and a member of the venerable Congregation of Father Pavone, established in the Collegio Massimo of the Jesuit Fathers at Naples. He found himself necessarily engaged in numerous domestic affairs; but he employed them for the profit of the Congregation by stipulating an advantageous donation in favor of the new house at Caposele. The care of his affairs kept him for some time at Calitri, and our holy founder permitted him to begin his novitiate at home, where he remained till March 3, when he proceeded to Ciorani to complete it. He made his profession in the presence of Father Villani, July 2, 1748. After rendering the greatest services to the Congregation, which he likewise made the heir of all his property, he died a holy death, August 11, 1764.

16867 On the occasion of the foundation of the house at Ciorani, the priest, D. Andrea Sarnelli, a brother of our Venerable Gennaro had given us by a public deed the sum of two hundred ducats annually. Wishing better to regulate this donation, he made to St. Alphonsus new propositions, which form the subject of the present letter.

16868 The Baron Angelo Sarnelli, the father of Don Andrea.

16869 D. Nicola, D. Domenico and D. Ciccio (or Francesco) were brothers of D. Andrea.

16870 From this petition we may perceive that although the saint was altogether opposed to the union of his Congregation with that of Don Vincenzo Mannarini, yet the Grand Almoner had himself endeavored to bring about this union.

16871 The full title of the Italian work is: "Pratica del confessore per ben esercitare it suo ministero."—The large work of Moral Theology of which St. Alphonsus speaks had been published some months before under the title: "Medulla Theologiæ moralis R. P. Hermanii Busenbaum S. J. cum adnotationibus per R. P. D. Alphonsum de Ligorio . . . adjunctis." (I vol. in 4°.)

16872 Mgr. Felice Leoni, an Augustinian, was born at Giovenazzo, July 14, 1677; was consecrated bishop, September 26, 1735, and died in 1754.

16873 The Cardinal entrusted the examination of the Rule of the new Institute to his auditor the abbate Blaschi, and on the 11th of October he sent to the Sacred Congregation a report favorahle to the approbation, using nearly the same words that the saint used in his notes.

16874 This great haste on the journey from Cirignola to Santa Agata della Puglia was shown by Fathers Sportelli, Villani, Cafaro and six others, in the month of January, 1746. We subjoin the account given by Father Sportelli to Father Mazzini: "January 22, we set out in a heavy rain, which lasted the whole day, and so we reached Ascoli thoroughly drenched. A room was given to us containing two beds; there nine of us were obliged to find accommodations as best we could. When morning dawned, we set out for Ascoli, still thoroughly wet, and the day was so cold that our clothing froze upon our bodies. We were in great haste, for our Father had told us to begin the mission on Sunday the 23d; however, we found him at Santa Agata and learned that he had opened the mission on Saturday, 22, and had preached on Sunday. As his breast began to give him great trouble, I had to continue the mission."

16875 Twenty carlini are equal to 8 fr. 50 centimes; a carlino, being equal to 7 cents of our money.

16876 This young man was D. Giovanni Tommaso Nittoli, of the village of Leoni. Admitted into the novitiate, April 6, 1749, he made his profession, March 28, 1750, and after a .holy life died on Holy Thursday, in 1785. Many favors are said to have been obtained through his intercession.

16877 It was on January 28, 1749, that Father Villani who was at Rome informed the saint of the Pontifical approbation of the Congregation, which was thenceforth called Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. The Brief of approbation: Ad Pastoralis dignitatis fastigium was promulgated February 25.

16878 After receiving the Pontifical approbation Father Villani and Brother Francesco Tartaglione made a pilgrimage to Loreto to thank our Blessed Lady.

16879 This affair was the proposition of Father Muscari to enter the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.

16880 Father Muscari had been charged to attend to the printing of the Rule, approved by the Holy See.

16881 The Congregation by the change of its name obtained the favor of reciting the Office of the Most Holy Redeemer, such as was already recited at Venice.

16882 In consequence of this acceptance Father Muscari made his profession at Rome, June 1, 1749, in the church of the Most Holy Trinity, in the presence of two notaries. Cardinal Domenico Orsini, representing on this occasion the person of St. Alphonsus, received by proxy the vows of the newly professed.

16883 This work of Father Giovanni Antonio Bianchi of the Minor Conventuals of St. Francis, was published at Rome (1745—1751) under the title: "Della potestà e polizia della Chiesa, trattati due contro le nuove opinioni di Pietro Giannone." (Of the power and government of the Church, in two treatises directed against the new opinions of Pietro Giannone.)

16884 As Father Muscari was to pass through Naples to go first to S. Eufemia, his native place, and then to Ciorani, he was to take the aforesaid work to Brother Francesco, who then lived at Naples in a house belonging to the Congregation.

16885 Don Giuseppe de Rosa, a native of Nocera de' Pagani, was at that time studying theology at Rome; and as he was under the direction of Father Muscari, also conceived the desire of entering the new Congregation. St. Alphonsus received him, but the young priest remained only a few months in the novitiate. In 1775 he became Bishop of Policastro.

16886 Father Robertis was a native of Sieti, where his sisters were living at the time.

16887 Father D. Francesco Buonomano.

16888 On seeing the good effected by the missions, Mgr. Giuseppe Nicolai became more and more a friend of the Institute of St. Alphonsus; and although he had already given large subsidies for beginning the foundation of the convent at Caposele, he yet gave this year one hundred ducats more for the enlargement of the house, and he kindly consented to ordain Gerardo Grassi and Pasquale Amendolara, both natives of the diocese of Conza.

16889 The Fathers of the Congregation of the Most Holy Sacrament.

16891 D. Nicodemo de Angelis of the diocese of Benevento.

16893 D. Benedetto Grazioli, a great friend and benefactor of the Congregation.

16894 Pasquale Amendolara was a young student for whom Father Margotta was to obtain a letter dimissory from the archbishop.

16895 Father Margotta was giving a mission at Atella, a town in the diocese of Melfi.

16896 This other young man was Donato Mellacio, who had not yet attained the proper age to enter the novitiate.

16897 These two others were Vito Polestra and Domenico Blasucci.

16899 Don Angelo Latessa, a secular priest at this time, afterwards entered the Congregation.

16900 The building of the house at Caposele.

16902 S. Maria Maggiore, a hamlet of Nocera.

16903 St. Alphonsus, who could never he satisfied with the Neapolitan examiners charged with the revision of books, no doubt refers here to certain difficulties which were raised against "The Glories of Mary." The teachings followed at Naples were generally very severe, and the holy Doctor had more than one discussion with the censors, as one may gather from his letters.

16904 Matteo Testa, a celehrated missionary who became later on Grand Almoner and died as Archbishop of Reggio.

16905 A Neapolitan priest, the author of several learned works.

16906 Vitolano, a town in the diocese of Benevento.

16908 Montefalcione, a town in the diocese of Benevento.

16909 St. Alphonsus, after the mission given at Melfi in the month of April, 1750, went to preach a mission at Ripacandida where, says Tannoia, he did not omit to pay a visit to the Carmelite nuns, and he was greatly edified by their fervor.—Their monastery had been founded October 15, 1735, by the archpriest Giambattista Rossi, who died in the odor of sanctity in the month of November, 1746.

Sister Maria di Gesù was the niece of this archpriest and of the archpriest of Contursi, the author of the Life of Mgr. Cavalieri, uncle of St. Alphonsus. How much our saint esteemed this nun, appears from the many letters addressed to her.

16910 The Sister had written to him as follows: "Wishing to adore (Jesus Christ himself) in himself, and not himself in myself, who am infinite baseness, I cannot succeed. What causes me most pain, my Father, is that having reached the greatest depth of my hell, I nevertheless feel myself, notwithstanding my immense miseries, united with this good Master, and in the closest manner. I am afflicted to see him so profoundly abased in me; but when I wish to break this union, to leave him himself in himself and myself in myself, I feel myself dying, and it seems that my soul must separate itself from my body; for our Lord does not wish to consent to this, and he continues to hold me in the close union of which I have spoken. What happens to me in Communion, happens to me also in prayer; night and day, continually, at every moment, I find myself in this state, in which, however, I preserve my liberty. Be so good my Father, to give me advice, and tell me whether I am not an idolatress of myself. Dissipate my fears; you well understand in what an abasement I find myself; help me for the love of the Most Blessed Virgin and of my mother St. Teresa, whom you love; for I know that you love her. Finally I beg you to forgive me if I have written too much . . ."

16911 These new Spouses were two daughters of D. Benedetto Grazioli of Atella, a very pious and rich man who bestowed abundant gifts upon the Institute of St. Alphonsus.

16912 There were at Naples two seminaries: one destined properly speaking for the Neapolitans; this was called the urban seminary; the other destined for the Neapolitans of the diocese of Naples; this was called the diocesan seminary.—(Sparano, Historical Memoires).

16913 Father Margotta was then a prey to great interior trials, as is shown in his correspondence with Father Cafaro, his director.

16914 Father Giuseppe Muscari, of whom mention has been made above (Letters 107; 108, 109) having been appointed Prefect of students on account of his extensive erudition, abused this high trust and caused the loss of vocation to four young men, namely, Pasquale Adinolfi, Domenico Cacciatore, Gaetano Spera, and Domenico Sviglia. He depicted the condition of the Congregation to these youths in the very darkest colors, and then proposed to found a new Institute in the city of Rome. His treacherous plan was only too successful, for after his dismissal from the Congregation—as St. Alphonsus had penetrated his base design—the four deluded youths presented themselves to the saint and haughtily demanded a dispensation. Not being able to obtain this, they turned their backs upon their vocation. This sad story may be found in Tannoia in his Life of the saint, Book ii. chap. xxxv. We however add that Gaetano Spera and Domenico Sviglia, seeing the folly of their course, returned after some time, and had the happiness of dying happily in the Congregation, the former in the year 1762, the latter on March 27, 1797.

16915 On account of the ill-feeling that had arisen between Fathers Muscari and Mazzini St. Alphonsus had sent the latter to the house at Caposele.

16916 Nicodemo de Angelis saw his profession considerably delayed on account of the requirements of his patrimony. The eulogy bestowed upon him by St. Alphonsus on account of the purity of his morals, he merited during the course of his whole life. We take pleasure in transcribing here a note that Father D. Lorenzo Nigro in "Vita del Servo di Dio Antonio Puzzo, familiare de' PP. del SS. Redentorè" (Napoli 1792), has consecrated to his pious memory: "Father D. Nicodemo de Angelis died in our house at Ciorani in the odor of sanctity, aged sixty-two, having been a member of the Congregation for forty-three years and four months. He was visited by the Lord with a long and painful apoplexy, which deprived him of the use of his right arm and left leg. His resignation to the divine will was heroic, and as he could no longer celebrate Mass, he received our Lord every day in holy Communion. He showed the greatest devotion to the Passion of Jesus Christ and to the Blessed Virgin Mary. Most exact in all the exercises of the Community, he was the first to rise in the morning, in all seasons, and went at once to the choir and the church under great difficulties; he could be seen moving through the corridors, resting with one hand against the wall, in order to visit and to speak to our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament. Having been thus tried for more than five years, after many other new sufferings, he died the death of the just in the peace of the Lord, May 19, 1792."

16917 Cardinal Francesco Landi.

16919 There was then question of a foundation at Rionero in the diocese of Melfi.

16920 Father Petrella was born June 29, 1726, at Trivico; he made his profession, July 2, 1748, and died a holy death at Iliceto, March 15, 1771.

16921 This was probably Father Salvadore Gallo who was then temporary Superior in the absence of Father Carmine Fiocchi. The latter had the preceding month succeeded Father Paolo Cafaro as Rector of the house at Iliceto.

16922 Rev. Father Carmine Picone was born, October 8, 1727, at Candida, in the diocese of Avellino. "I made the acquaintance of the servant of God"—he thus speaks in the process for the beatification of St. Alphonsus—"when I was sent in the year 1749 by my Ordinary to Ciorani to make the spiritual exercises before receiving the Order of subdeaconship. I remained at Ciorani ten days; the servant of God gave the exercises; he preached in the evening and Father Villani in the morning. There I had for the first time an opportunity of beholding his extraordinary zeal and of witnessing the great fruit which resulted from his fervent exhortations. There I heard the voice of God calling me to leave the world and to embrace the Rule of the Congregation. . . . . I then firmly resolved to enter the Institute. This resolution I carried out some six months after the spiritual exercises; I proceeded to the house at Ciorani where the servant of God, after examining me, as well with regard to my vocation as to my studies, admitted me and gave me the habit of the Congregation, October 25, 1749."

The general catalogue of the Congregation speaks in the following terms of this subject: "Father Carmine Picone died in our house at Nocera, October 16, 1795. He was a holy, mortified, and exemplary member of the Institute; on account of his great virtue he was made Master of novices, Rector several terms, and finally Consultor-General.

16923 This nephew of Father Ferrara was the future Father Giuseppe Melchionna, who received the habit of the Congregation, March 4, 1752.

16924 Mgr. Basta was a very great friend of the Carmelite Fathers, whose Order he even wished at one time to enter; but this friendship was the cause of great embarrassment to the holy Prioress of the convent of Ripacandida. The fact was, the Carmelites of Naples wished to introduce into this monastery a mitigation to which both the Prioress and St. Alphonsus were opposed. Moreover, as Mother Maria di Gesù was following extraordinary ways, the bishop had her examined by a Carmelite Father, and the latter declared her to be a visionary. Finally, in the year 1752, Mgr. Basta, after having taken away from the Sisters their old director, forbade them to have any communication with other directors. This rigorous measure caused great disquietude among these religious. St. Alphonsus tries in this letter to remove this disquietude.

16925 This important affair was a persecution from which the Institute suffered in consequence of a calumny circulated against it. The king was made to believe that the Congregation had acquired a property of great value.—The sick man was Father Paolo Cafaro.

16926 Brother Francesco Tartaglione, carried away by the passion of anger had thrown a tumbler at a lay-brother who offended him by some sarcastic words. He received his penance in the spirit of humility, after which he was admitted to profession, October 31, 1752.

16927 This was a young priest from the diocese of Cava, who on account of the opposition made by his family was not as yet able to begin his novitiate.

16928 Pietro Paolo Blasucci, who in 1793 became Superior-General of the Congregation, secretly fled from Ruovo, his native place, in order to enter the Institute of the Most Holy Redeemer. After the opposition of his family had subsided, he began his novitiate, August 14, of the year 1752.

16929 In fact, Ignazio Fiore, a native of Riccia and Pietro Picone began their novitiate June 21.

16930 There is question of the profession of Donato Melaccio and of Fabrizio Cimino, which took place July 16 of this year.

16931 This subscription aimed at promoting the sale of the Moral Theology of the saint, a second edition of which was at that time being printed at Naples.

16932 To understand these words it is enough to refer to a passage of a letter from Father Rossi, written in answer, June 20: "My Father (thus speaks Rossi), I have already spoken to Signor D. Andrea about the building of a church, and I have promised him to spend for it every year one hundred ducats; the mode of carrying away the earth has been discussed and the baron has been approached on the subject; he also has the intention of contributing something towards the building of the church, and Don Andrea has offered to furnish all the lime and to maintain the expense of two oxen that are to be used to carry the material."

16933 The ambrette is a plant with the odor of ambergris or musk.—Perhaps the saint intended these plants to adorn the altar of the Blessed Sacrament.

16934 Father Francesco Del Corpo had made his profession a month before, that is, May 13.

16935 That is, for the affair of the foundation of the house at Ciorani made by D. Andrea Sarnelli. The saint, to secure its stability, caused another contract to be made by which (the Congregation having already been declared by the civil authority incapable of making any purchase) he personally accepted the donation from D. Andrea.

16936 San Matteo, a hamlet of Nocera.

16937 Father Bernardo Tortora, born at Nocera de' Pagani, entered the Congregation in 1743. The cause of his secession from the Congregation, which happened July 25, 1752, is given by Tannoia in his Life of the saint: "While living in the house at Ciorani, he took offence at a correction given him by the Rector, and without breathing a word, or communicating his temptation to any one, he set out for Pagani with the intention of laying the whole matter before St. Alphonsus. On the way his eyes were opened, and not having the courage to present himself, he retired to his own family, instead of going to one of our houses." Later on he became parish priest of the church of St. Felice at Pagani.

16938 This excellent religious was born November 9, 1706. When forty-three years old he resolved to enter the Congregation, having been moved thereto by the holy life of Father Cesare Sportelli. After a novitiate of six months he made his profession in the presence of St. Alphonsus, August 5, 1750. He became an indefatigable missionary, and died in the peace of the Lord, March 4, 1777, in the house at Ciorani.—The journey to Ischia, of which mention is made in the letter was to have taken place on the occasion of the mission at Casamicciola, the native place of Father Buonamano.

16940 From the following letter written by Brancone to the saint we can conjecture the reply of the saintly Prioress.

NAPLES, February 10, 1753.

Dearest Friend: Your letters, the one dated the 29th of last month, and the other, the 4th of this month, filled me with consolation, for in them I read the proofs of your kindness and of the love which you bear me: I thank you with all my heart.

I have read the letter of the Prioress of Ripacandida, which you kindly sent to me. Rest assured that I shall never communicate to anyone what has been confided to me by you and by her. The letter showed me that she held with regard to my proposed step the same opinion that some other devout and learned persons hold. I adore the divine will which disposes of me in this manner, and I shall continue to bear my burden with the greatest devotion and cheerfulness, hoping that our Lord will deign to bless me. I have never refused to bear the burden, nor am I doing so now; but as I see how difficult it is to work out my eternal salvation, I grow despondent and my courage vanishes. For this reason I ask you and all your chosen souls to obtain for me from God better health that I may fulfill the duties of my office scrupulously and cheerfully. And as in your letters you spoke of the Prioress, Sister Maria di Gesù, as a pious servant of God, I feel a great desire to open a correspondence with her for my spiritual advantage; I hope to obtain this favor through you and through the bishop to whom she is subject. Hence, as soon as you approve of my wish, let me know where Ripacandida is situated, and whether the Prioress—as a Carmelite—is subject to the Provincial of the Carmelites or to the bishop. If the latter be the case, please tell me who the bishop is, adding at the same time what you know about the family of the Prioress and of the condition of the nuns in the monastery. I intend to do this under your direction and with your approval.

I thank you for your prayers, and I beg you to continue them. . . . .

16941 Father Bernardo Apice, born at Castellammare, December 21, 1728, made his religious profession, January 6, 1748, and died September 9, 1769. He had therefore spent twenty-two years in apostolic labors, now in Naples, now in Sicily, where he was Rector for three years. Father Agostino Saccardi wrote the life of this saintly man, which was printed at Naples in the year 1816.

16942 Born at Monteparano (diocese of Taranto) April 26, 1711, he was appointed Bishop of Melfi, January 9, 1748, and occupied this see till the beginning of the year 1766.

16943 Born at Atella (diocese of Melfi) June 13, 1724, he took the habit of our Congregation November 12, 1759, and made profession November 21, 1760. He was probably the son of Don Benedetto Grazioli, a distinguished benefactor of the Institute, who is often mentioned in the letters of St. Alphonsus.

16946 Father D. Carmine Fiocchi was born June 13, 1721, at Caiano, in the diocese of Salerno of respectable and virtuous parents. At an early age he was a model of fervor. Prayer was his delight, and so desirous was he of doing penance that his mother was obliged to take from him the instruments of mortification with which he tortured his innocent body. When he reached the proper age, his parents sent him to Naples where he might receive an education suitable to his birth and fortune. There in the course of his studies, in which he distinguished himself, he remained steadfast in piety, so that his beautiful soul, full of the love of Jesus Christ well understood how to despise the vain allurements of the world. Having entered the seminary of Salerno, young Fiocchi soon after received subdeaconship. Anxious however to belong to God without reserve, he aspired to the religious life, and after having prayed much, his choice fell upon the Congregation of St. Alphonsus. He then wrote to the holy founder who, after examining his vocation, wrote to him that it came from God, that God wished him to belong entirely to Him, and finally that the resolution that he had formed should be at once put in execution.

Animated by these words the fervent seminarian hastened to Ciorani to make his novitiate. His parents, notwithstanding their piety, were in consternation on account of his departure, and so much were they moved by their affection for flesh and blood that they applied to the civil authorities to aid them in their design. The authorities arrogating to themselves the right of sustaining such unjust pretensions, ordained that the novice should be shut up in a convent at Salerno , there to examine and to prove better his vocation. But with God's help the young man triumphed over all obstacles and had finally the satisfaction of being able to return to the novitiate, where he made his religious profession in the presence of St. Alphonsus, May 8, 1744.

After he had become a priest, he was destined for the work of the missions. The success that he met with was wonderful. Without any fear of exaggeration it may be asserted that he was one of the greatest missionaries of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. During the thirty years that he spent in this laborious ministry, he led back to God innumerable sinners, sanctified the clergy of many dioceses, and re-kindled fervor in a great number of monasteries. He was only twenty-eight years of age when he was called to be the Superior of the house at Pagani; and in 1750, after the death of Father Sportelli, St. Alphonsus appointed him to be one of the three General-Consultors.

All the virtues of a religious shone brilliantly in Father Fiocchi. But he distinguished himself above all by his fervor in prayer, his spirit of mortification, his love for Mary Immaculate and for his devotion to our Blessed Mother of the Seven Dolors. Then the love that he felt for Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament was without a parallel: when he offered the Holy Sacrifice he resembled a seraph. This worthy son of St. Alphonsus went to his eternal repose in 1776, while sweetly invoking the name of Mary. Four years after his death his body was found incorrupt.

16947 Pietro Picone, cousin of Father Carmine Picone, born May 24, 1733 and admitted to the novitiate June 21, 1752, fell ill during the last months of his novitiate. The malady appearing serious, the Superiors wished to send him for some time to Manicalciati, his native place. This determination was the occasion of great sadness to the pious youth, since this departure for home had the appearance of dismissal from the Congregation. He therefore wrote a long letter to the holy founder, entreating him not to send him away from the house of God. The saint sent him the foregoing letter. Pietro Picone made his profession in the presence of Father Paolo Cafaro at Caposele, on the day indicated in the answer of St. Alphonsus, and died a holy death in the same house at Caposele, in the month of November of the following year.

16949 Don Giambattista Rossi, archpriest of Ripacandida and founder of the discalced Carmelites there, died with the reputation of a saint, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, in the year 1746. Many miracles were wrought through his intercession. The Life of this great servant was printed in the year 1752 and dedicated to His Holiness, Benedict XIV. One of the sisters of Rossi lived at Pescopagano; and for this reason, St. Alphonsus in the following letter advises Father Giovenale to seek for relics of Don Rossi at Ripacandida.

16950 Father D. Francesco Giovenale, born at Lacedogna, February 6, 1719, entered the Congregation in 1747, and after a virtuous life died at S. Angelo a Cupolo, June 16, 1782.

16951 The archpriest of Lacedogna Don Domenico Antonio Cappuccio was from the year 1748 one of the penitents of Father Cafaro.

16952 Another penitent of Father Cafaro.

16954 Father Cafaro was a native of Cava.

16955 Father Bernardo Apice.

16956 Father Paolo Cafaro, born at Cava July 5, 1707, was admitted to religious profession July 2, 1741, and died August 13, 1753. At his death, St. Alphonsus, adoring the divine judgments, expresses the feelings of his heart in a celebrated little hymn on the will of God, that begins with the following words:

Il tuo gusto, e non il mio

Amo solo in te, mio Dio.

Voglio solo, o mio Signore,

Ciò che vuol la tua bontà.

Quanto degna sei d' amore,

O divina Volontà,

('Tis Thy good pleasure, not my own,

In Thee, my God, I love alone;

And nothing I desire of Thee

But what Thy goodness wills for me.

O will of God! O will divine!

All, all our love be ever Thine.)

In the year 1767, the saint published a short sketch of the life of Father Cafaro.

On the death of Mgr. Falcoia Father Cafaro became the spiritual director of our saint, who, as appears from his journal, afterwards asked Father Andrea Villani to fill that position. The words of the journal are as follows: "All the obediences given by Father Paolo and by other directors have been confirmed by Father Andrea, this day, August 15, 1753."

16957 The funeral oration by Father Bernardo Apice is preserved in the archives of Father General at Rome.

16958 Very likely he refers to the sermons preached about the deceased Father Paolo Cafaro.

16959 Father Apice had composed a funeral oration on Father Cafaro, and his oration had been sent to Nocera to furnish notes for Father Alessandro de Meo who likewise pronounced a funeral oration on the deceased, August 30, in our church at Pagani.

16960 This young man, a native of Ruvo, diocese of Muro, became later on (1781) Superior-General of the Congregation in the Pontifical States.

16961 This Congregation was called Ritiro delle Vergini dell' Immacolata Concezione e di S. Vincenzo. (Asylum of the orphans of the Immaculate Conception of St. Vincent de Paul.) It was built under the direction of Cardinal Spinelli, who committed the care of it to Canon Nicola Borgia, later on (that is in 1751) Bishop of Cava. About 500 young girls found shelter in this retreat.

16962 Demetrio Barbugli, S. J., has written among other works "Spiritual Readings for the Use of Nuns, or Commentary on Some Passages of St. Bernard."

16964 The Congregation had not been recognized as an ecclesiastical corporation; and could not therefore acquire any property.

16965 This friend was Carmine Ventapane of Maratea, in the diocese of Cassano, and was one of the ablest professors of medical science at Naples. He was very zealous and at the same time wealthy. Having seen with his own eyes the spiritual abandonment of the people of Calabria, he resolved to have missions given there at his own expense, and for this purpose he applied to St. Alphonsus and to Father Margotta. And in fact, when everything had been arranged, the missions began in November 1756.

16966 Francesco Antonio Bonaventura, born at Barletta, was a great friend of St. Alphonsus. A man of great piety and learning, he was preconized bishop of Nusco, November 26, 1753, and he governed his diocese up to the year 1788.

16967 No doubt the saint evidently meant that they were not of much value in regard to their practical utility for missions.

16968 The said Rules were printed at Rome in 1750, after the Institute of the Redemptoristines had been approved by the Holy See. It seems that the copy sent to the saint at Nocera was lost.

16969 A grain is twenty-fourth part of a pennyworth troy; 15 grains are equal to 64 centimes, a centime being about one fifth of a United States cent.

16970 The first volume of the second edition, begun in Naples in 1952 and finished in 1755.

16971 The saint had asked the Pope to interpose his mediation with the civil authorities, in order to obtain the exequatur of the apostolic Brief by which our Congregation had been approved.

16974 In the month of May, 1753, Mother Maria di Gesù was relieved of the office of Prioress, having been succeeded by Sister Maria of the Holy Ghost.

16975 A convent at Naples.

16976 Mauro Murante and Michele di Michele, both of Melfi, had entered the Congregation by the advice of the Sister.

16977 D. Luigi Mercante, a young man of twenty-eight years of age and already Auditor at the tribunal of Lucera, was a penitent of Father Fiocchi. Sister Maria di Gesù urged him to enter the Congregation; but certain obstacles, unknown to us, prevented the execution of this pious project.

16978 Probably to confer with Mother Angiola del Divino Amore in regard to the affairs of the Congregation.

16979 Cassano Irpino, a place in the diocese of Nusco.

16980 This pious subject, born in Avellino, October 20, 1728, made his profession, May 27, 1751, and after many apostolic labors died the death of the just at Ciorani, January 3, 1813.

16981 It appears that this order was so efficacious that the sick man was entirely cured. Father Giuseppe Landi thus relates the miracle in his chronicles: "While I was staying at our house at Ciorani, Father Saverio Rossi was lying at this house seriously ill; but as his malady grew worse and the sick man was already given up by the doctors, suffering as he was from a dangerous hiccough, our Father Alfonso who was staying at Nocera de' Pagani, distant about eight miles from Ciorani, wrote every day for information regarding Father Saverio. When I wrote to him that the latter was very ill and that there was but little hope of recovery, he wrote to me that I should tell the sick man that it was his intention that he should get well, and should be cured of his sickness. Through obedience I informed him of this, but D. Saverio grew worse, and I at once informed the saint that all hopes of recovery had banished. Then the saint, full of confidence in God, wrote with his own hand the following words: My dear Father D. Saverio, I wish that you should get well, and this I command under obedience, and for the love of Jesus Christ and of the Blessed Virgin I command you. After having received and read this letter, I had not the courage to read it to him; but as Father Andrea Villani, an old Father of great virtue, was staying at the house, I begged him to take it to the sick man and to make known to him the will of our Father. Father Villani having approached the bed of the dying Father said to him: 'Father Saverio, have you faith in obedience?' The latter having answered in the affirmative, Father Villani made known to him the order of our Father Alfonso; the sick man having devoutly kissed the letter, put it under the pillow of his bed, and wonderful to relate! from this time he began to grow better, and in a short while arose from his bed quite restored."

16982 Antonino Sersale, born at Sorrento, June 26, 1702, first archbishop of Brindisi, then of Taranto, was created archbishop of Naples, February 16, 1754, then Cardinal with the title of Santa Pudenziana, April 22 of the same year. On the 23d of the said month he took possession of his new church assisted by D. Giulio Niccolò Torni, Archbishop of Arcadiopolis, but he came to his church only on the 16th of the following June.—He died at Naples, June 24, 1775.

16983 The reason of this decadence is well expressed by Canon Sparano in his Historical Memoires of the Church of Naples (vol. ii. page 350). "Cardinal Spinelli," he says, "went to Rome at the end of 1749 for the opening of the Holy Year, and remained in this city till he resigned this See, that is, for the space of four years and two months. Ecclesiastical studies began to decay immediately after his departure. . . . etc."

16984 These three Congregations were: 1. The Congregation of the Archiepiscopate, or of the Propaganda, or of the apostolic missions, erected under the patronage of Marry Queen of the Apostles; 2. The Congregation of Father Pavone or the Conference; 3. The Congregation of the Purity or of S. Giorgio. These three associations are still in existence.

16985 Cardinal Sersale had formerly been a member of the Congregation of the Apostolic Missions.

16986 D. Giuseppe Iorio and D. Giambattista Fusco were both members of the Congregation of the Archiepiscopate. The former is the author of the famous work "Il Vescovo consolato," and of many other works. Sparano pronounces a most beautiful eulogy on Don Fusco in his Memorie Istoriche, tom. ii. pag. 374.

16987 A large volume would be needed in which to narrate the life of this learned and exemplary religious. Born at Corato, October26, 1724, Antonio Tannoia made his profession, December 8, 1747, and as soon as he was ordained priest, the office of Master of novices was entrusted to his care, and a short time afterwards he was made Rector of the house at Iliceto. "When I was still a young man"—so he speaks of himself in the process of beatification of St. Alphonsus—"I was so afflicted with a combination of diseases that the first doctors of Naples despaired of my recovery. The servant of God, however, said to me one day: 'Have no fear, you will not die; but you will have to lead a life of great bodily infirmity.' I have lead such a life and I am leading it still, because it is now nearly fifty years that I have felt myself always afflicted by grave maladies; I have expected death every moment, and if I did not die, and if I am to live, my life will be a life of misery and pain, as the servant of God has told me." Thus he spoke in 1796. But notwithstanding these continual and very great sufferings, he lived heroically faithful to all the exercises of piety, to the fatigues of the apostolic ministry, and to study. He wrote several valuable works, and among them the "Life of St. Alphonsus." (3 vols.) He died a holy death at Iliceto, March 12, 1808.

16988 Father Gasparo Caione was appointed Rector of Caposele about the end of July, 1754, in place of Father Mazzini who did not find the air very healthy. He was a native of Troia, and was born there, August 4, 1722. He had studied law at Naples; he was a man of great talent. Following the voice of grace, he entered the Congregation, September 18, 1751, in which he rendered very great services during his long life. He died at our house in Benevento, October 30, 1809.

16989 The feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin was every year celebrated with the greatest pomp in our church of the Mater Domini at Caposele.

16990 Father Andrea Strina, a native of the city of Lettere, was admitted as a subdeacon to the novitiate, March 1, 1748. He labored much for the glory of God and the salvation of souls, and died full of merit at S. Angelo a Cupolo, April 21, 1797.

16991 Benedetto Grazioli of Atella, a rich man and a great benefactor of the Congregation, had at that time come to Caposele to spend some weeks in solitude and prayer.

16992 Father D. Angelo Latessa arid Frater D. Pietro Picone were sick at that time; and a short time after both died; the first, October 5; the second, November 9, of the year 1754.

16993 Venerable Gerardo Maria Maiella had been with Father Margotta at Naples during three months, and was re-called to Caposele at the beginning of October of this year. A year after his soul entered Paradise.

16994 Francesco Saverio Manfredonia, a native of Bovino had been professed for three months, when his father came to solicit the favor of taking him to his native place.

16995 These two young men were Lorenzo Nigro di Bella, of the diocese of Muro, and Giambattista Gargano di Montella, of the diocese of Nusco. Both were however admitted to the novitiate the following year.

16996 Father Caione made Frater Manfredonia set out from Caposele to Nocera, and from Nocera St. Alphonsus sent him to Ciorani.

16997 Manfredonia, ordered to proceed to the convent of Ciorani, left it, November 21 without a dispensation from his vows, and contrary to the formal obedience of not leaving this house. May 30, 1755, not having yet received the dispensation, he was forced to re-enter the Institute; but as he had lost the spirit of the Congregation he was dismissed as incorrigible; this time he was released from his vows. Such was for this unfortunate young man the sad result of having concealed his temptation against his vocation.

16998 The occasion of the expulsion of Father Gerardo Grassi is found described by Father Tannoia in his Life of the saint: "Alphonsus having ordered Father Grassi to be sent to Iliceto, the latter, who was in the house at Ciorani refused to go. But the motives of the one that gave the command and of the one that did not wish to obey were diametrically opposite. Father Grassi with little edification due to the Community, wished to assist his brother who was making his studies at Salerno; and St. Alphonsus for the same reason wished him to change his abode, and seeing the resistance that this subject made, dismissed him from the Congregation."

16999 This uncle was Canon Domenico Rosato who had greatly aided his nephew when he entered the Congregation, as is seen in the letter of Father Cafaro to St. Alphonsus.

17000 September 7, 1752, Mgr. Marco de Simone, Bishop' of Troia, had in fact written to St. Alphonsus in the following terms: "When you consider Don Gasparo Caione ready for sacred orders 1 shall at once ordain him, although I have deferred perhaps for a long time to ordain all the others,"

17001 The student Michele di Michele.

17002 The little work of the Visits to the Blessed Sacrament and the Blessed Virgin.

17003 A most excellent young man of Ruvo, who as we have already indicated became afterwards Superior-General of the Congregation in the Pontifical States.

ROMÆ, 13 Junii 1755.

C. A. CARD. CAVALCHINI.

P. GUGL1ELM1, secretarius.

17005 Father D. Tommaso Pagano, the first director of the saint, died shortly after, August 25, of the same year 1755.

17006 This communication was conceded by a Pontifical Rescript of July 19, 1756, and a Brief of August 11, 1757.

17007 This Father seems to have been Father Apice; but the fear of the saint vanished a short time afterwards, because the Father reformed in such a way that he lived and died a saint, as may be seen in his Life written by Father Agostino Saccardi.

17008 The Master of novices was Father Tannoia; but on account of bad health, he was obliged to stay at Iliceto for some months.

17009 The two other candidates that received the holy habit with Francesco de Paola, on the feast of St. Aloysius de Gonzaga, were Michael Ferrazzano di Solofra and Sebastiano de Jacobis di S. Fele.

17011 The second volume of his Moral Theology.

17012 Twenty carlini = 8 fr. 50 centimes.

17013 Father Carmine Fiocchi was then Rector of the house at Iliceto.

17014 To understand the meaning of this, see note added to the letter dated August 5, of the year 1755.

17015 Father Saverio Rossi, Rector of the house at Ciorani, and Father Pasquale Caprioli, the Minister.

17016 D. Vito Polestra and D. Donato Melaccio, natives of the archdiocese of Conza, who were then to receive Holy Orders.

17017 The Bishop of Muro, Mgr. Vito Moio, was greatly displeased at the entrance into our Congregation of young Francesco Antonio de Paola, his diocesan.

17018 The second volume of his Moral Theology, to which he wished to add Elenchus 99 questionum post primam editionem anni 1748 reformatarum.

17019 The work "Pratica del confessore per ben esercitare il suo ministero," of which mention has already been made, and the work "Dissertatio scholastico-moralis pro usu moderato opinionis probabilis in concursu probabilioris."

17020 Luigi Capuano, horn at Cava, June 21, 1739, was admitted to the novitiate, July 14, 1755.

17021 The Venerable Brother Gerardo Maiella was then collecting for the building of the house at Caposele, and he died shortly afterwards, that is, October 15, 1755.

17022 Ten tomoli = 5 1/2 hectolitres; a hectolitre being equal to 2 bu. and 3.35 pks.

17023 Father Caione speaks of this fact in the juridical depositions for the beatification of the saint (Summar. n. 18, § 93): "The house of Caposele," he says, "was burdened with a seigniorial tax, above the sum which his Majesty, Charles III, had assigned us; the latter sum amounted to about four grains a day [about 20 centimes] for each subject. I succeeded in having the Municipal Council convoked to abolish this enormous tax of forty ducats [170 frs.] annually; as the tax exceeded the sum given us as an alms by the king; but all in vain. 1 found myself covered with shame and confusion; every one contradicted me. I thus reported the whole affair to the servant of God, and he answered in the following terms: 'As the people of Caposele have treated us so well, it is necessary to think of avenging ourselves; but how shall we do this? Listen: be more liberal henceforth in dispensing alms, be more assiduous in the confessional; when you are called to the sick run without any hesitation; do not complain of the wrong done you; let this be your revenge.' "

17024 Luigi Capuano became later a great missionary, but he had not the good fortune of dying in the Congregation, as we shall see further on.

17025 In the journal of Father Pasquale Caprioli we read this notice: "November 14, 1755, Father Rector Major went to give a mission at Benevento, and returned with Father Spera to Pagani, December 12."

17026 Brother Francesco Tartaglione, having finished the penance of which we have spoken in the letter of May 10, 1752, was sent back to Naples where he lived as he had always till his happy death in a house of the Congregation. At that time St. Alphonsus, while on his way to the mission at Benevento, was staying for two days at Naples with his mother who was seriously ill, and thus it happened that the Brother spoke to him about the purchase of the works of St. Augustine.

17027 D. Gerardo Gisone, born February 10, 1720 at Recigliano, in the diocese of Muro, made his profession, September 8, 1756, and after a virtuous life, died in 1765.

17028 In the general catalogue of the Congregation we read the following statement: "In the General Chapter held on the 15th of October of the year 1755, after deliberately weighing the matter, it was decided by the Fathers assembled in Chapter to admit into the Congregation youths who have attained the age of sixteen years and six months, whereas formerly they could not be admitted before their eighteenth year. The climate of Ciorani has not proved very beneficial to the novices; besides, by reason of the many courses of spiritual exercises held there—the number of those following the exercises being at times two hundred—the novices were disturbed and distracted; it has therefore been decided to transfer the novitiate to Iliceto, to the house of Santa Maria della Consolazione. The place was truly well adapted for a novitiate, being tar removed from all the noise of the world; the novitiate was placed under the care of Father Antonio Maria Tannoia, Rector and Master of novices." Thus far the catalogue.

17029 Father Tannoia had done his utmost to have the novitiate transferred to Iliceto.

17030 His pious mother died a few days after the saint had written this letter, and he received the news of her death with perfect tranquility. The following is what Father D. Pasquale Caprioli says of this event in his juridical deposition (Sum. n. 11, § 43): "His virtue was heroic on hearing of the death of his most pious mother. Donna Anna Maria Cavalieri was a lady of so religious a spirit that she daily recited the divine Office like a cloistered nun, and was so exact and scrupulous in regard to the fasts of the Church that she observed them most rigorously notwithstanding her old age, being ninety-four years old when she died. She led a devout life and practiced mental prayer, in which she was directed by her own son. Our servant of God heard the sad news of his mother's death while giving a mission at Benevento, and without having lost his self-possession he preached in the evening, and merely told the people in a quiet way that they should recommend to God the soul of his mother."

Moreover, Father Nicolò Grossi in his juridical deposition (Sum. n. 11, § 154) speaks thus: "I saw him perform an heroic act of resignation to the divine will when he received the news of the death of his mother at Naples. We were to go with him to a mission in the city of Benevento. Having heard that his mother, whom he himself directed in the ways of God, was ill on account of her advanced age and other indispositions, he sent us ahead on the usual Bracigliano road, he himself taking the road to Naples where he arranged all the spiritual affairs of his mother, and then set out for Benevento. A few days after, he received a letter announcing her death. He came to table with us, and before dining he said in a tranquil manner without having lost his composure that he had received notice of his mother's death; and that on the following morning we should have the charity to apply the Mass for her soul; in a firm voice he intoned the prayers recited before meals. Both I and my companions were filled with admiration at such virtue."

17031 Father Amendolara, born at Contursi, in the diocese of Conza, December 20, 1723, entered the Congregation in the year 1747, and died, May 1, 1755. He was greatly beloved by St. Alphonsus, because he was full of fervor and a man of great talent.

17032 A little before, the saint had written thus to the same Father: "Know that I do not wish to have cornices at the doors, in the choir, or in the library. Have patience; if you have put them there, have them taken away and see that everything be made plain. Poverty loves simplicity and what is necessary, not what is superfluous."

17033 This was done. Giambattista Ansalone was admitted to the novitiate, January 24, 1756, and made his profession September 8, of the same year.

17035 This hymn in honor of St. Aloysius is found among the works of the saint (Vol. ix. page 438).

17036 Mention will again be made of Mauro Murante in a subsequent letter. He was born at Melfi, May 6, 1735; he received the habit of our Congregation February 13, 1754, and was professed December 24 of the same year.

17037 The Venerable Brother Gerardo Maiella used to stay with the Murante family whenever he came to spend some time at Melfi. It was, therefore, this family that furnished the account of the miracles wrought in this city by the holy Brother. (See Life of Brother Gerard.)

17038 The Venerable Brother Gerardo had died, October 15, 1755, and Father Giovenale having been his director for a time, he had written an account of his Life just as Father Caione had done.

17039 See Letter of August 5, of the year 1755.

17040 Siesta, the taking of an after-noon nap, practiced by people of hot countries and by other people.

17041 Father Apice, Minister of the house at Caposele and as such charged with the care of the lay-brothers was at that time occupied in the work of the missions.

17042 Father Villani was at that time Rector of the new house at S. Angelo a Cupolo.

17043 Probably a new Brother admitted on the recommendation of D. Benedetto Grazioli of Atella.

17044 Father Ferrara, born June 9, 1715, made his profession, March 25, 1748. He was a learned man and rendered many services to St. Alphonsus in the publishing of his works. How excellent his life was may be inferred from the words of the holy Founder, who called him a man dead to his own will. Father Ferrara died, August 22, 1767 at S. Agata de' Goti.

17045 In consequence of the unjust complaints of the lay-brothers in the house at Iliceto, the saint took away from the Brothers in all the houses the hour of sleep (siesta) during the day. This decision created also a semi-revolution among some of the Brothers in the house at Ciorani. The sad event is thus narrated in the journal of Father Pasquale Caprioli: "January 15, owing to some murmurings among the Brothers at Ciorani three of them one at Pagani, and two at Ciorani—were confined to their rooms for eight days. This penance was given to Brothers Carlo, Giuseppe and Domenico; then January 20, Brother Crescenzo of Sarno was dismissed for not wishing to submit to the foregoing penance."

17046 This short letter is a postscript added by him to a letter written to Father Tannoia by a student, Frater Pietro Paolo Blasucci.

17047 Those that had just received the habit (January 24, 1756) were the priest D. Gerardo Gisone and the acolyte Giambattista Ansalone.

17048 The city of Potenza is an episcopal See, and had at that time a population of 6585 souls.

17049 It appears that D. Fabrizio Cimino because of his illness, of which mention is made in a letter of the 20th of this month, was sent for a change of air to the mission at Rocca. In this letter he is called Father, but it seems that he was not yet a priest, having been born March 29, 1733.

17050 Father Francesco Pentimalli was born, September 20, 1714, at S. Eufemia, in the diocese of Mileto, in Farther Calabria. He had already been ordained priest before entering the novitiate, February 13, 1751; he made his profession in the presence of St. Alphonsus October 2 of the same year. While setting out in company with several other Fathers for the missions of Sicily, he was overtaken by death at his native place, S. Eufemia, November 15, 1761. He was truly an apostolic man of God.

17051 It was customary that when a Father was sent to another house to assist at a mission, he continued to apply the Masses to the intention of the house to which he was ascribed. Father Basile therefore having been sent from Ciorani to help the Fathers at Iliceto should have said Mass to the intention of the house at Ciorani; hence the Fathers at Ciorani created a commotion about which the letter speaks. Whereupon the saint ordered Father Tannoia to remedy this confusion.

17052 Tannoia tells us in his "Life of St. Alphonsus" (Book ii. chap. xxxix.) that King Charles had proposed to the saint to undertake the reform of an ancient and respectable Order. "According to the king's plan, St. Alphonsus and his companions were to take the habit and the name of this Order without, however, relinquishing the observance of their own Rule; moreover, they were to give missions in the same manner as hitherto, and to act in every matter as it should seem best to the saint." Thus far Tannoia; it appears to us this affair of Matera and the reform proposed by the king are identical.

17053 This candidate from Torrecuso, in the archdiocese of Benevento, was young Giuseppe Maffei. He was admitted to the novitiate May 1 of this year.

17054 This work on Scripture did not please him as it gave only the literal sense. See Letter of January 11, 1756.

17055 After having spent at Naples six or seven weeks, occupied with the affairs of the Congregation and preaching with an indefatigable zeal, St. Alphonsus returned to Nocera de' Pagani to spend there Holy Week, to contemplate according to his custom the mysteries of the Passion of our Lord. He had scarcely returned when he fell dangerously ill, and his illness lasted from April 10 to 17, that is, from the Saturday before Palm Sunday till Holy Saturday. "It would be a fine thing," he said, "to die during Holy Week," and he repeated three times the words: "Oh, what a fine thing would it be to die in Holy Week! for my illness is serious," he added. Father Caprioli having answered: "Let us leave it all to God," "yes," said the saint, "what God wishes I also wish, and his good pleasure is mine." On the first day of his illness he had one of the students, Frater Buonassisa, to read to him the Proficiscere anima christiana,—Depart, Christian soul—and on hearing it he cried out: Oh, what beautiful prayers, what beautiful pearls of Paradise! Before going to bed he said to some sick persons who had come to see him: "Love Jesus Christ and do his will, as I wish to do myself by going to bed."—These edifying

17056 Lorenzo Nigro had made his profession the preceding day.

17057 Vitelli and Pica were two novices who had been sent away.

17058 Giuseppe Paravento and Isidoro Leggio made their profession June 3.

17059 This little work published during this year, 1756, bears the title: "Breve dissertazione contro gli errori dei moderni increduli, oggidi nominati Materialisti e Deisti." (A brief dissertation against the errors of modern unbelievers called to-day Materialists and Deists.)

17060 The lay-brother Mattia Fazzano was a skilful clock and watchmaker; the saint, therefore, did not wish him to accompany the Fathers on their missions, as the Brother probably had to make clocks for the houses.

17061 Father Rizzi had written to his penitent Mgr. Tommaso Pacelli Bishop of Bovino, a letter in which he reminded the prelate of his duties, telling him that the people of the diocese were greatly dissatisfied with him. This indiscreet letter so angered the bishop that he wished to imprison this zealous, but too imprudent Father.

17062 The permission, namely, of having the Blessed Sacrament in the chapel of the novitiate.

17063 The means employed was to transfer the novitiate to Nocera. This occurred July 18, and the novitiate remained there till October 15, of the following year.

17064 "In the beginning of July"—says Tannoia—"Alphonsus went again to Naples. He was most anxious to see his Congregation better established and secured by royal authority, and to obtain the exequatur for the apostolic Brief. On the 10th of the same month he wrote to Father Gasparo Caione: 'Make a novena and have the people to make it for the success of the affair of the approbation.' On the 20th he again wrote: '1 am laboring hard at Naples, but 1 meet with difficulties. Let us leave the matter in God's hands. Make another novena with the discipline every evening, and have the people to make a second novena' . . . He remained more than a month at Naples; he might have been seen in spite of the burning sun running from the house of one minister to the other. But all in vain; the opinion of Mgr. Galliano prevailed, and under pretence that the king in granting the exequatur to the Bull would not be free to suppress the Congregation should it degenerate, the petition was refused." So far Tannoia, Book ii. chap. xliv.

17067 Father Francesco de Leo was then teaching philosophy, and after the course of philosophy had been finished, having to teach theology to the same students, he wished to procure for us from France a certain number of copies of Tournely's Theology. St. Alphonsus preferred to apply to his publisher, Giuseppe Remondini at Venice, and the latter procured the books in question as one may see in a letter of the saint to Remondini, dated March 14, 1757.

17068 Mother Maria di Gesù had been re-elected Prioress at the end of the month of May, 1756.

17069 The holy nun had been, as we have said, deprived of daily Communion. As we have seen in Letter 248, St. Alphonsus interceded with Mgr. de Melfi to remove this prohibition.

17071 The stipends of the Masses of Father D. Pietro Petrella.

17072 Here there is question of the vineyard which Don Andrea Sarnelli had presented to the Congregation. The Baron Nicola Sarnelli, after the death of his brother, made so many efforts to annul this donation, raised so many difficulties for the Institute that it was agreed, December 7, 1755, to pay him within a certain space of time the sum of a thousand ducats.

17073 The feast and the octave of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin were celebrated with great solemnity in the house at Caposele.

17074 Frater Lorenzo Nigro, to whose ordination the laws of the kingdom were opposed, as he was the only son, was subsequently ordained at Benevento, in the Papal domain.

17075 This work is probably that which was printed in Milan in the year 1715 and which bears the title: "I prodigi della grazia espressi nella conversione di alcuni grandi peccatori, morti da veri penitenti nel monastero della Trappa della stretta osservanza Cistercienze, opera transportata dalla lingua francese nell' italiana da un monaco di Buonsollazzo, e dedicata a' Peccatori.—The French work had appeared in 1696 under the title: "Relations de la mort de quelques religieux de 1' Abbaye de la Trappe" (2 vol. in 12mo); l' Abbé de Rancé is the author. The edition of 1713 was enlarged by another volume, Paris, Delaulne.

17076 The "Rule for Seminaries."

17077 The letter addressed to the Bishop of Sicily of which mention was made in a preceding letter, number 278.

17078 Maffei was the agent at Iliceto of the Prince of Castellaneta, and as the officials of the commune depended on him, he succeeded in preventing our Fathers from cutting wood, and from using other privileges.

17079 He did not enter the Congregation, or at least he did not make his profession.

17080 The Archbishop of Conza wished to impose on the Fathers of Caposele the duty of hearing the confessions of the nuns of Calitri; a thing that was forbidden by the Rule of the Institute.

17081 Father Margotta was a native of Calitri. It was he whom the archbishop wished to have as confessor of the nuns.

17082 The young man Amato Ricca had begun his novitiate March 25 of this year, but on account of weak health he was sent to Caposele. He made his profession at Ciorani, April 20, 1758.

17083 Giuseppe Caputo, having become a widower, retired into our Congregation in company with his son, and became a lay-brother. When the time for his son's ordination drew near, he was expected at Ciorani to settle about the patrimony of his son.

17084 Edmond Purchot (Purcozio), Rector of the Paris university (1651—1734). The fourth edition of his Institutiones philosophicæ appeared at Lyons and at Paris in 1753.—The edition of Padua is of 1751.

17085 After one year of government this holy religious had again become a simple subject.

17086 The Venerable Brother Gerardo Maria Maiella died in the odor of sanctity, October 15, 1755. Father Caione had his portrait taken and many copies of it were printed at the expense of Don Benedetto Grazioli of Atella who had held the holy Brother in the highest esteem. This esteem was shared by Sister Maria di Gesù who had the happiness of speaking more than once with the Venerable Brother. She had been a witness of one of his ecstasies. See Life of Brother Gerardo.

17087 "An liceat ab alio pecuniam accipere, vel simile quid, quod in pauperes distribuatur?" (Et respondet:) "Si ita accipiat ut liberum ei sit his vel illis dare, tum omnino contra votum facturum, si accipiat sine facultate (Superioris), cum neque proprietas, neque usus illius rei, independens a Superiore, cuiquam paupertatis voto obstricto conveniat."—Paupertas, tom. 3, tit. 112, § ii. in fine.

17088 Religious Perfection, part 3, treat. 3, ch. 15.

17090 "Administratio autem bonorum monasteriorum seu conventuum ad solos officiales eorumdem, ad nutum Superiorum amovibiles, pertineat."—Sess. 25, de Regular. et Monial, cap. 2.

17091 Francesco Siniscalchi, knew not how to overcome the temptations that assailed him and he was allowed to leave the Congregation, December 30, of this year 1757. Having then become a priest, he was a few years afterwards assassinated in Sicily by a friend to wbom be had lent some money.

17092 The students of the Congregation must make a short retreat every Sunday till the signal which is given before dinner.

17093 Father Pietro Paolo Blasucci, one of the chief ornaments of our Congregation, was born at Ruvo, in the diocese of Muro, February 22, 1729. Having finished the humanities and philosophy, he found himself impelled to follow the generous example of his younger brother Domenico, who had entered our Institute, and secretly fled from his father's house. He received the habit, August 14, 1752, and on the same day of the following year, he made his profession. We may easily form an estimate of his talents, of his prudence and of his other striking qualities wben we learn that St. Alphonsus promoted him, though he was still a young man, to the important position of Superior and director of the Sicilian missions. Blasucci was only thirty-two years of age when he undertook to found the house at Girgenti. It would take a large volume to record all his labors on that abandoned island, and the many petty annoyances which he had to suffer from evil-minded men and from the civil authorities. In the year 1792, Father Pietro Paolo was elected Superior-General of the Congregation, and after governing the Institute in a saintly manner for twenty-four years, he died full of virtue and merit in our house of S. Michele de' Pagani, May 13, 1817, at the age of eighty-eight.

17094 Father Gisone was then socius of Father Tannoia, or assistant of the Master of novices.

17095 Don Angelo Maione was born at S. Domenico, in the diocese of Cassano, March 17, 1733, and was admitted into the novitiate, August 15, 1758; he made his profession, April 15, of the following year. For a long time he was a most useful member of the Congregation, but unfortunately he afterwards disgraced himself by attempting to introduce the Regolamento, a matter which is treated in the "Life of St. Alphonsus."

17096 A novice just dismissed.

17097 These three novices, sent from Iliceto to Ciorani before their profession, were Amato Ricca, Teodosio Telesca, and Andrea Morza. They made their vows April 20 into the bands of Father Pietro Paolo Blasucci.

17098 The title of this work is as follows: "Disinganni per vivere e morire bene, sopra le cinque parole di S. Paolo apostolo, opera composta dal P. Francesco della Croce, carmelitano scalzo." (Disenchantments, or Instructions to Live and Die Well, founded on Five Words of St. Paul the Apostle. Work composed by Father Francis of the Cross, a discalced Carmelite.)

17099 Gaetano Maturazzo had made profession August 31, 1946. The loss of vocation was for him the greatest misfortune; for after leaving the Congregation he led a disorderly life and found his death in a brawl, dying without the consolations of the Church.

17100 It seems that in view of the death of the Arcbbisbop of Conza, whicb occurred on October 24, the Fathers of the house at Caposele wisbed to propose for his successor a person who in his quality of bishop could not be elected, but had to be asked for. Hence the canonical term of Postulation. We add that the See of Conza was subject to Pontifical nomination.

17103 Raffaelle Palumbo, a native of Avigliano, in the diocese of Potenza, began his novitiate December 25, 1758.

17104 A work of Charles Duplessis d' Argentré, Doctor of the Sorbonne; he died in 1740 Bishop of Tulle. In 1702 he published, among other works, the Elements of Theology in Latin.

17105 The Frenchmen, that is, the Fathers of the Mission.

17106 The laws of the kingdom did not permit to those that were the only sons to become priests; and because D. Lorenzo Nigro was the only son of his family St. Alphonsus required him to renounce his inheritance, so that the Congregation might not be molested. It seems that this renouncement took place; because in September 1759, D. Lorenzo was ordained priest at Benevento, outside of the kingdom.

17107 It seems that Father Caione had complained tbat the saint bad appointed Frater D. Sebastiano de Iacobis as secret inspector of the Community at Caposele, an appointment that gave so much the more displeasure, since he was only twenty-two years of age, and was professed but one year.

17108 Father D. Sabino Barberio, born December 23, 1712, had been professed only seven weeks when he was dismissed from the Institute.

17109 Abate Giovanni Ciceri of Grottola in the diocese of Matera had conceded to St. Alphonsus, November 3, 1757, the right of giving a name for the laic chaplaincy founded by the same Abate, with the obligation, as it seems, of contributing to the maintenance of one of his family in a seminary.

17110 Frater Fabio Buonopane had made his profession, December 25, 1758, in the house at Iliceto.

17111 Constantino Santorelli came forth victorious from all tbe attacks made upon him, and thus bad the consolation of entering the novitiate, February 12, and to make his profession December 25, 1759. He died at Nocera in 1787. His spirit of obedience won for him the title: Maximus in minimis (Very great in very small things).

17112 D. Domenico Cacciatore was one of the four students seduced by Father D. Giuseppe Muscari (see Letter 124). But although the saint had re-admitted him, he nevertheless, it is not known why, did not re-enter the Congregation.

17113 Mgr. Niccolò d' Amato, before becoming Bishop of Lacedogna, had been up to the year 1749, vicar of Mgr. Nicolai, Archbishop of Conza, and thus having be en present at all the transactions preceding the foundation of Caposele and well instructed in regard to the whole question, was the only one who could help our Fathers and quiet our opponents.

17115 Native city of Father Tannoia.

17116 Francesco Antonio Maffei a man of very great influence at Iliceto began thenceforth to molest our Congregation.

17117 Baron Sarnelli, after having, December 7, made an agreement (of which mention is made in Letter 266) by which the donation given by his brother was ratified, and after having given up every claim, began again to molest the Congregation by creating new law-suits and by annoying the Institute during many years.

17118 That is, the Congregation or Confraternity of Pilgrims which had for its object to give lodging to pilgrims.

17119 There is question here, probably, of the little work entitled: "Dissertatio de justa prohibitione et abolitione librorum nocuæ lectionis." (Dissertation on the Just Prohibition and Abolition of Bad Books.)

17120 Mgr. Isidoro Sanchez de Luna Benedictine of Monte Cassino, born at Naples, November 16, 1705; was first bishop of Ariano from May 6, 1748 to April 22, 1754, then archbishop of Taranto from April 22, 1754 till May 28, 1759, and finally Archbishop of Salerno from May 28, 1759 till the year 1783.

17121 Father Pasquale de Matteis, born in the city of Lecce, April 4, 1705, entered the Society of Jesus, May 18, 1720, and always lived in it with much fervor of spirit. As he was always held in great esteem on account of his learning and virtues, the most honorable offices were entrusted to him. He was professor of rhetoric, of philosophy, of Greek, of Moral Theology, Rector of Massimo College for fourteen years, Provincial, and finally, Superior of the house at Naples. He also published some ascetical works which were highly prized. The famous Minister Bernardo Tanucci made him some flattering promises to induce him to leave the Society, but he refused every offer and took with his companions the road into exile. He died a holy death at Rome, February 20, 1779.

17122 In the month of September of this year the Jesuits had been expelled from Portugal, through the machinations of the execrable Marquis of Pombal.

17123 The work entitled: "Dissertatio de justa prohibitione et abolitione librorum nocuæ lectionis."

17124 This work was published in 1760 under the title: "Selva di materie predicabili et istruttive per dar gli esercizi ai preti, ed anche per uso di lezione privata a proprio profitto." (Selva, or Collection of Material for Sermons and Instructions for Ecclesiastical Retreats, and also for Private Spiritual Reading.)

17125 D. Raffaelle Palumbo, D. Constantino Santorelli and D. Epifanio Mazzarelli made afterwards their profession, December 25, into the hands of their Master, Father Tannoia.

17126 In fact, Father Murante had so much lost the spirit of fervor that after one month he lost his vocation; but soon afterwards he felt so bitter remorse that it caused his death.

17127 Andrea Morza was born at Caposele, September 17, 1739, and made his profession, April 20, 1758. His life was short but holy. He had a great desire to go among the heathen, as we see from the following letter written to St. Alphonsus, September 6, 1758: "My dear Father: The Lord in his goodness has deigned to enkindle in my heart the desire of laying down my life for him; and not a day passes that I do not wander with my thoughts among the barbarous nations, imagining that I am in the midst of them, bound with chains, shedding my blood for my Jesus. I am in great hopes that this moment so happy for me will come. The Lord knows how diligently I study; but I do so only for this end, and many times a day I renew the vow that I have made.—My dear Father, I beg you for the love of Jesus and Mary to grant me permission not to eat flesh-meat during the novenas of the Blessed Virgin, of St. Teresa, and of the Blessed Sacrament. I conclude by kissing your feet and asking your blessing.—Your most unworthy son, Andrea Morza of the Most Holy Redeemer."

As he could not set out for the missions among the heathen, Andrea Morza, just ordained priest, asked to go on the missions in Sicily. His request was granted; but after eight months he was taken ill with consumption and was obliged to return home where he died, August 5, 1764, We have many of his letters addressed to his director, Father de Leo; they justify his high reputation for sanctity.

17128 This letter was written from Naples, because the saint was at that time giving the exercises of which he had spoken in his letter of December 3, the preceding year.

17129 An examination of the general catalogue of the Congregation shows that these two priests were not admitted.

17130 Father Giuseppe Melchionna, a nephew of Father Girolamo Ferrara, was born at Teora in the. archdiocese of Conza; he made his religious profession March 3, 1753, and died in our house at Nocera de' Pagani in the year 1803. Father Tannoia in his "Life of St. Alphonsus" book ii. chap. lxii. speaking of Father Melchionna's charity and of the temptations against his vocation, cites this letter with the following reflections: "St. Alphonsus entertained so high an idea of our holy vocation that it caused him inexpressible anguish when he perceived any one tempted to turn his back upon the Congregation. At such times he endeavored to discover whether it was merely a temptation or whether it was the diabolical obstinacy of the will. If he saw it was only a temptation, he sympathized with the subject and assisted him by his prayers; he even excused certain impertinences. A young Father, who thought he had been sent to Iliceto as a punishment wrote an impertinent letter to St. Alphonsus, asking either to be removed from Iliceto, or to be dispensed from his vows. St. Alphonsus who saw the temptation, replied in a jocular tone: 'When St. Anthony, etc.' " Tannoia then adds: "With mildness, tempered, however, with a little severity St. Alphonsus dissipated the temptation and gave peace to the afflicted subject."

17132 Tito, a place in the diocese of Potenza.

17133 Mgr. Marcello Papiniano Cusano was not beloved at Palermo, because, he was not originally from Sicily, but a Neapolitan, from Frasso, in the diocese of Sant' Agata de' Goti.

17134 This mistake or rather this swindle is thus related by Father Tannoia in the Life of the saint: "A Neapolitan gentleman taking advantage of the veneration in which the name of Alphonsus was generally held, wrote in his name to different dioceses requesting pecuniary assistance for the benefit of the works of piety in which he was engaged. On account of the high esteem in which Alphonsus was held large sums were obtained. Although this man was anxious to take his letters from the post-office, it providentially happened that our Brother Francesco Tartaglione, who was at Naples transacting business, succeeded in being ahead of him. Alphonsus opened a letter at Pagani and discovered to his amazement that Mgr. Lucchesi had instructed his agent to send him (Alphonsus) twenty ducats. Alphonsus thanked the prelate for his courteous exhibition of kindness and informed him at the same time that not he but some swindler had made such a request in his name. Monsignor answered him more courteously and requested him to receive the money, and use it as he thought best."

17135 The Sicilian ounce is equal to 12.75 frs.

17136 This work entitled: "The Great Means of Prayer to acquire Eternal Salvation and all the Graces that one Desires," published in the preceding year, 1759.

17137 The unfortunate Father Norbert, a Capuchin, called later on Abate Platel, had written principally against the Jesuits the work "Mémoires historiques sur les Missions des Indes orientales" (Historical Memoirs on the Missions of the East Indies 1744, 2 vols.)—and "Mémoires historiques apologétiques" (Historical Apologetic Memoirs) presented in 1751 to the Sovereign Pontiff Benedict XIV.—The first work was condemned by the Congregation of the Index in 1745; the other in 1751.

17138 Father Bartolomeo Corrado had made his vows, November 12 this year.

17139 It seems that Father Caione and the other Consultors gave a favorable vote; for we read the following notice in the general catalogue of the Congregation: "On the 25th of March, 1761, Don Pasquale Giuliano a cleric and doctor of medicine, a native of Moncianisi, in the diocese of Capua, aged thirty years, three months and seventeen days, was admitted to the novitiate. He made his religious profession, August 15, of the same year in the presence of Father Giovanni Rizzi; the time which he spent at Ciorani teaching the humanities (one year and eight months), was reckoned as a part of his novitiate." After many years of zealous apostolic labor, he passed away to his reward in our house at Girgenti, in Sicily.

17140 There is here question of some particular propositions; it being known that Father Daniele Concina was a very rigid author.

17142 The Archbishop of Trani in whose diocese was situated the city of Corato.

17143 In the Life of Father Apice mention is made of this religious as of a very holy person. Some of the letters addressed to her by the celebrated missionary are quoted in this book.

17144 Father Chiesa belonged to the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine of the Congregation of S. Giovanni a Carbonara. He was a very learned man and a great friend of St. Alphonsus.

17145 Father Tannoia in his Life of St. Alphonsus (book ii. ch. xlvii.) narrates at length the reform of this asylum, which was undertaken and brought to a happy issue by the Fathers of our Congregation.

17146 Chiara Gaiano, niece of our Father Carlo Gaiano, was a native of Spiano, diocese of Salerno. St. Alphonsus had been her director when she was in the world. Hence she wrote to him as soon as she made her profession in the monastery of the SSma Trinità at Ravello. The saint answered her by the present letter.

17147 In a. letter addressed to Father Tannoia, dated June 8, 1792, the Sister thus expresses herself on this subject: "My mother having become blind, I wrote to Monsignor [St. Alphonsus] that he should recommend her in his prayers and asked him whether he could not beg God to cure her. He answered me, November 7, 1758, that such a thing was impossible. I was then staying with my family on account of the illness of my mother. But Monsignor in the letter which he wrote pressed me to enter the convent, saying that he did not wish me to lose my vocation on account of my mother . . . I obeyed, and a short time afterwards I entered as a religious the convent where I had spent a year as a pupil."

17148 From this it would seem that the saint intended to write the Life of Frater Domenico Blasucci and that of Father Sportelli.

17149 Ettore Carafa.

17150 Giovanni Rizzi was born August 22, 1713 of good and pious parents, at Zungoli in the diocese of Ariano. When he was a year old, death took his father from him. Having been confided to the care of an uncle, who was a Canon, he devoted himself to study. After completing his philosophical course, as he was gifted with a brilliant mind, he was sent to Rome, where after a few years he gained the doctor's degree. Having been ordained priest on his return home, he devoted himself for some time to the education of youth, when yielding to the request of Mgr. Giovanni Anzano, he went to the seminary of Campagna, where he taught first philosophy, with great applause, and then, theology; afterwards as Rector of the seminary, he worked for the good of the Institute with a zeal proportioned to his great gifts and to his sanctity. In 1750 he entered our Congregation, and after a fervent novitiate of six months, he made his profession December 25, of the same year. His life was ever worthy of a son of the Congregation. He was a true model of regular observance and of missionary zeal. He showed wonderful skill in giving the spiritual exercises to priests and to gentlemen. His fame being spread abroad by these labors, bishops and the first cities of the kingdom vied with one another in endeavoring to secure this great preacher. After years of continual labor in the ministry, the servant of God, fell asleep in the Lord, January 6, 1771 at our house of S. Angelo a Cupolo, and God did not delay to manifest the sanctity of his servant by several miracles.

17151 The Bishop of Sisteron, Pietro Francesco Laffiteau wrote among other works: 1. "History of the Constitution Unigenitus;" 2. "Refutation of Anecdotes on the Constitution Unigenitus." He was a determined adversary of the Jansenists.

17153 Don Carlo Gaiano was a great missionary of our Congregation.

17155 This youth was an acolyte named Pietro Francesco Romano; he received the habit January 17, 1762.

17156 These Fathers were General-Consultors.

17157 Father Francesco Pentimalli had been sent with Father Pietro Paolo Blasucci and two other Fathers to Sicily to establish a foundation at Girgenti. The Fathers made the journey overland, and when about to go to Messina they were obliged to stop, the communication between Calabria and Sicily having been broken by rumors that a pestilence had broken out. Father Tannoia says: "Seeing it impossible for the moment to proceed, Father Pentimalli halted at S. Eufemia, his native place, for the purpose of giving some rest to his companions; but scarcely had he arrived on November 10, when he was seized with a violent fever, which carried him off in three days. This loss afflicted Alphonsus deeply. Father Pentimalli was one of his best missionaries; for besides his rare talents he had such power over the hearts of others that he could lead them as he wished."

17158 After the death of any member of the Congregation all the priests of the Institute must apply five Masses for the soul of the deceased confrère.

17159 Father Biogio Amarante, a distinguished missionary, died November 2, in our house at S. Angelo a Cupolo. He was born November 25, 1722 at Nocera de' Pagani, and had made his profession July 12, 1744.

17160 The work entitled: "The True Spouse of Jesus Christ," published the preceding year.

17161 Vincenzo Buonopane was born August 26, 1743 at Grottaminarda in the diocese of Avellino; he was admitted to the novitiate December 25, 1761 and to profession, January 6, 1763. He died a holy death at Naples (where he had been sent for a change of air), assisted by Father Girolamo Ferrara, February 7, 1764.

17162 Mgr. Gioacchino Martinez, Bishop of Avellino was opposed to the young man's entrance into the novitiate, as he wished to keep so able a subject for his own diocese.

The writer is obliged to Mr. Justin McCarthy for instructing Mr. Disraeli that the word "Apology" bears more meanings than one. In the "Apologies" put forth by Doctors and martyrs, from the 'Apology' of Tertullian in the second century, and that of Dr. Newman in the nineteenth, Catholic Doctrine, &c., has rather been explained and defended than apologized for."

"It was the intention of the Catholic king that this salutary work should never cease to exist." Did the king then mean to live forever to protect it? We trust God has rewarded his good intentions; but, though the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer is little more than a century old, it has already seen the end of his dynasty.

The Passionist Fathers had already begun to evangelize Northern Italy when St. Alphonsus founded the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer in the South. It is worthy of remark that our saint's learned and most pious uncle, Monsignor Cavalieri, Bishop of Troia, was the great friend and protector of St. Paul of the Cross and his companions, who used to say that the labors and austerities of this holy prelate, even in old age, made them ashamed.

It is hardly necessary to observe that, though the saint was at the head of the literary men of his country for some two thirds of a century, his genius never emitted a spark of literary jealousy.

17172

The Father who so coolly accepted his master's post in 1785, lived, let us hope, to repent, of so easily taking the first place while the saintly Founder was alive. He died at Frosinone in 1814.

His usual mode of requesting, and even commanding, was, "Have the goodness to oblige me," "Do this in charity for a poor old man," "For the love of our dear Lady gratify me in this," "Have compassion with a feeble old man, and obey for the sake of Jesus Christ," "I beseech you to give me this consolation, that you will do this for the love of God," &c.

Several descendants of the saint's brother, Count Hercules Liguori, and of his sister Teresa, Duchess of Presenzano, still glory in claiming as their collateral ancestor, the great bishop and doctor. Like most of the old families of Naples, thy have considerably declined from their former wealth, power, and consequence. Those of the family who were present at his canonization, had the gratification of seeing his statue honored with a niche in St. Peter's.

This elegant work of art is a miracle of taste and genius, wrought by the first artist of the day, in the purest white marble. It is almost thirty feet in height, a perfect colossus. The likeness to the saint is striking—those who knew him in life have testified to this. The mitre and crosier are held by a cherub.

In eighteen centuries the title of Doctor of the Church had been conferred only on seventeen. St. Bonaventure, Card. Archbp. of Albano, who died in 1274, closed the illustrious category until March 23, 1871, when St. Alphonsus was elevated to this rare dignity.

When Hoffbauer reached Rome, he accidentally as it were wandered into the little church of St. Julian, and being greatly struck by the deportment of some religious who were praying before the altar, he asked a little boy to what order they belonged. "They are Fathers of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer," answered the child, "and you, sir, will one day belong to their institute." Clement, astonished at this, asked for the Superior, and hearing that the Redemptorists were the religious of the world-renowned Monsignore Liguori, he immediately joined them, to the dismay of his friend and companion Hubl, who was still undecided as to what order he would embrace. Instead of retiring to rest that night, Clement prayed till morning that his dear friend Thaddeus might obtain of God a vocation to the Congregation. The prayer was granted. Hubl called upon him early next day, and begged to be admitted among the novices.

Father General Blasucci was a younger brother of the venerable Dominic Blasucci, "the Aloysius of the Congregation."

There is a story current, we know not upon what authority, that St. Alphonsus, seeing a sailing vessel bound for New Orleans, prophesied that his sons would yet possess flourishing establishments in that city, and become the instruments of the perfection and salvation of innumerable souls.

17789 His Holiness, Pius IX., by an autograph rescript, September 7, 1854, confirmed August 8 and September 23, 1859, attached to each of the two prayers of St. Alphonsus, beginning with the words, My Lord Jesus Christ,—Most Holy Immaculate Virgin, —an indulgence of three hundred days each time that one recites with, at least contrite heart, either the first before the Blessed Sacrament, or the second before an image of the Blessed Virgin. His Holiness granted, besides, a plenary indulgence, once a month, to persons who during this time recite every day both those prayers in the manner indicated, provided they confess and communicate and pray for some time to the intention of the Sovereign Pontiff.—ED.

17794 We have two kinds of Visits to the Blessed Virgin, one of which is found in several editions published at Naples, and the other in those editions that have appeared elsewhere. Both kinds, however, were without doubt written by St. Alphonsus. This is the reason why we publish them in his complete works. It may, perhaps, be asked why two kinds of Visits have been published, and which of the two was published first? To this no positive answer can be given, though we may venture on a conjecture. The Visits to the Blessed Sacrament appeared about the year 1745, with those Visits to the Blessed Virgin that we have put in the first place, and that were soon spread all over Europe. About five years after this publication, in 1750, the work called Glories of Mary was published, and excited comment on the part of some critics. An anonymous writer dared to reproach St. Alphonsus with having exaggerated certain prerogatives attributed to the Mother of God; but the saint at once replied to this attack and triumphantly repelled it. It is very probable that St. Alphonsus then replaced the first twenty two Visits that he had composed in honor of the Blessed Virgin by prayers drawn from different authors of great celebrity—prayers that had already been inserted in his book, the Glories of Mary, "to show the high idea that the saints had of the power and mercy of the Mother of God." The nine other Visits, joined to these prayers, appear to have been chosen with some modifications in the text which we regard as the first published. But this change was made only in the Naples editions; everywhere else the first prevailing text, or translations therefrom, have continued to be printed, with the exception of the first French translation which was made in 1773, from the fifteenth Naples edition.—ED.

18068 The circumstance to which St. Alphonsus here refers is thus related by him in his sermon for Septuagesima Sunday: "St. Philip Neri, speaking, one day, to a young man named Francis Zazzera, who expected to make his fortune in the world by his talents, said: Be of good heart, my son; you may make a great fortune, you may become an eminent lawyer, you may then be made a prelate, then perhaps a cardinal, and then, who knows, perhaps even Pope. And then? and then? Go, continued the Saint, and reflect upon these two words. The young man went his way, and after having meditated on the two words and then? and then? abandoned all his worldly prospects, and gave himself entirely to God. Leaving the world, he entered into the same congregation that St. Philip had founded, and then he died in the odour of sanctity."

18133 This little work was published in 1773, with the "Considerations on the Passion." The saintly author wrote on the 8th of September, 1773, in one of his spiritual letters: "Here are two little works, one of which may aid you to meditate on the Passion; I use it myself every day. . . . I also read every day something of the other little work, entitled Pious Reflections, etc. I wish you to do the same; for I wrote it specially for those souls that desire to give themselves up entirely to God."
